Almind held strong to her word, carrying the team on her back during certain stretches of the game as she continued her outstanding season. Colgate was primed for the upset and fought the Orange and Blue toe to toe during the first 25 minutes of the game. A key stretch where Almind had a steal, a rebound and two layups ignited the Bison. Creamer and Franks took over from there, giving fans one last glimpse at the dominating duo that changed the face of Bucknell women's basketball. The two seniors scored at will down the stretch and tallied a combined 40 points, almost half of the team's total. Almind took care of much of the rest by scoring 24 points and nabbing 15 rebounds.

The Junge Watch

RED BARONS

Following Bucknell's major-league alumnus

Eric Junge '99 trained with the Philadelphia Phillies at their spring training camp in Clearwater, Fla. After pitching 8.1 innings with the Phillies' talent-rich staff, Junge was optioned to AAA Scranton-Wilkes Barre, where he will train with the Red Barons for the remainder of spring training and will open the season with the team.

Junge also spent most of the 2002 season with the Red Barons, compiling an impressive 12-6 record with a 3.54 ERA. At Scranton, Junge can add to his experience and make adjustments to his pitches. The extra time on the mound in Scranton will hopefully earn Junge a call-up from the Phillies later in the regular season.

The Red Barons open their regular season on April 3 against Ottawa.

Abroad perspective: semester in Milan, Italy

Elsbeth Fager '04 visits the Galleria Vittorio Emanuele II, home to lively shopping, bars and restaurants along the Duomo. Fager studied music in Milan, Italy with the Institute for the International Education of Students.

Milan, once a capital of the Roman Empire, now serves as Italy's financial hub and cultural center. It presents residents and visitors with classic and modern Italian culture, fashion and commerce. From world-renowned shopping to a vast assortment of nightclubs and exquisite northern Italian cuisine, "la dolce vita" (the sweet life) is within reach. The city has elegant Gothic churches and some of Italy's finest galleries and museums. It was in Milan that Leonardo da Vinci painted "The Last Supper," and Giuseppe Verdi and Giacomo Puccini composed music that is still heard at the legendary La Scala Opera House. In Milan we never ran out of exciting things to see and experience.

I arrived at the Milan airport in late August, anxiously waiting for the semester with the Institute for the International Education of Students (IES) to begin. There were three other Bucknellians in the program. Monica Hoy '04, Carcline Myers '04 and I had come to Milan to study music, and Lindsay Renninger '04 was interested in the city life that Milan had to offer. Having friends from Bucknell there made the study abroad transition easier. When we arrived, the main view of the Duomo (the cathedral) was in scaffolding, but there was no doubt about the location of the heart of Milan. We spent many afternoons on the steps watching the Milanese go about daily life at the Piazza Duomo. I could never have imagined the variety and depth of culture I would come across every day during my tram rides and walks throughout this fashion capital and thriving metropolis.

Upon arriving at school, buses were waiting to take us away to "La Torrazzetta," an "agriturismo" (farmhouse used for retreats) to spend a weekend on a farm getting to know each other. Throughout orientation, our program included students from all over America and many other countries. The directors did a wonderful job helping us with the transition into Italian lifestyles and "modern-paced" city life in Milan. Many of us enrolled in L'Università Cattolica del Sacre Cuore, where we would be taking classes and eating meals in the cafeteria. Returning to Milan, we were very fortunate to be placed in a gorgeous three-bedroom apartment in a wonderful neighborhood. Our Italian roommate, Laura Ghidini, was a student at the Universita Cattolica and employed by IES as a resident assistant. She was very interested in American culture and enjoyed our stories about college life at Bucknell. She was a great friend and provided a nice opportunity for us to meet other Italians.

My first lesson in Italian came when we began our three weeks of intensive language preparation. I had picked up some necessary traveler's vocabulary the week before to go along with my background in Spanish, but I was far from prepared for life in the Italian city. Our professor entered this beginners Italian class determined to get us in shape for the Italian social scene. After a week of intensive language instruction, I became confident enough to begin speaking Italian. In my neighborhood café, I became the "studentessa americana" who came in every morning for a cappuccino. When we finished classes around noon every day, we would hurry to the café at L'Università Cattolica to secure our places in line for the usual panino. There is no such thing as a line in Italy; they don't believe in wasting space. Meal times promoted a competitive atmosphere in the café, but eventually everyone would be satisfied and move on to the bar for the daily shot of espresso. Being a mild coffee fanatic, this was my little drop of heaven. Starbucks doesn't even come close to the Italians' creation of the cappuccino.

The IES program kept my weeks busy studying Italian language, culture and music. To take a break from the demanding Italian grammar lessons, our classes often included sessions with cooking specialists, a tour of Leonardo da Vinci's "The Last Supper," an evening at a pizzeria or an outing to the Italian cinema. On the weekends, we frequently stayed in Milan to experience the nightlife that the city is known for. An evening among the Milanese begins with cocktail hour known as "aperitivo" followed by a stroll along the canal stopping to enjoy a jazz performance, opera or ballet, and then dancing until the sun comes up with the Milan chic in the craziest nightclubs in Europe.

As for other nightlife, unfortunately, the La Scala Opera House is being renovated until next year. We saw our first opera in Milan at the new Archimboldi Theater, modernly designed for the best acoustics. The change in venue worked well for the college students because the ticket prices were lowered to encourage attendance. We thought we would only be able to see one show at La Scala, but we were lucky enough to go frequently. We were thrilled to sit in the eighth row for the premiere of the ballet "Romeo and Juliet" and even the cheap student seats provided a spectacular view of "Lucrezia Borgia," "La Traviata" and "Rigoletto." The sophisticated Italians feel no need to wear their Versace evening gowns for this arena, but the atmosphere and performances are nonetheless first class.

Within a month, the program director, Dr. Roberto Andreoni, placed the music students in Milan's L'Accademia Internazionale della Musica. Monica, Caroline and I were given the opportunity to perform with the Academy's orchestra in several concerts across the city, including one at the extraordinary St. Ambrose Cathedral. We were the only Americans in the ensemble. This gave us an additional challenge and push to learn the Italian language. During the holiday season, our performance teacher managed to book our chamber ensemble a performance at a politician's cocktail party, and our final performance evaluation took place at Giuseppe Verdi's house for retired musicians (Casa Verdi). Dr. Andreoni gave us so many opportunities to experience music in Milan. I was fortunate to attend a master class given by renowned flutist Sir James Galway. As musicians, we were extremely lucky to have had such unique experiences.

When we weren't busy with life in the city, IES planned field trips to Cortina and Tuscany, which created a nice mixture between school trips and fun getaways with friends. In addition, I didn't have any problems convincing several friends studying in other European cities to spend a weekend in Milan. Milan's central location in Italy and its closeness to many wonderful cities is a convenient advantage for traveling. Florence and Venice were only three hours away, while Verona and Bologna were less then two hours away. All of these cities, although close, are very different in culture, language and politics.

Our second week in Italy included a field trip to Cortina, the glamorous ski village in the Dolomite Mountains. Taking a gondola ride up to the mountain refuge led us to freezing temperatures, but delicious European hot chocolate helped to revive us for the hike down. Arriving in September did not give us as much time to experience the warm weather of the beaches along the Mediterranean. With the last weekend in September approaching, we bought our train tickets to Levanto, a small town on the coast. Having pronounced it incorrectly at the ticket booth, the vendor almost sent us to France. I couldn't have asked for a better birthday weekend on the Italian Riviera. My friends and I enjoyed hiking from town to town and through the vineyards of the Cinque Terre, stopping to take a dip in the Mediterranean, tasting some local wine or sunbathing on the rocks.

We took advantage of the wonderful fall weather and spent a long October weekend in the hills of Tuscany. Wine tasting proved to be an enjoyable new hobby, and we sampled some of the finest wine in Montalcino. As part of the field trips, we were lucky to taste a wide range of Italian cuisine. On the way back to Milan, we traveled through Arezzo, where Roberto Benigni produced the remarkable film "Life is Beautiful" and arrived at a monastery outside Siena just in time to hear a Gregorian chant.

While touring Florence, I managed to trek up the terrifying stairwell to the top of Bruneleschi's dome, where apparently they frequently have ambulances waiting at the bottom of the stairs for the faint-hearted. Verona, famous for Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet," is also home to the Arena, now an open-air opera house, but originally built as a Coliseum in 200 A.D. Though it is a tourist trap and she never set foot on it, I couldn't help enjoying going up to Juliet's balcony. The ancient opera arena draws a full crowd every night of its season. We had the pleasure of attending George Bizet's "Carmen." The evening was perfect. The next night's performance, "Tosca", turned out to be slightly disastrous as we were sitting in puddles of rain 30 minutes into Giacomo Puccini's masterpiece.

Words cannot even remotely describe the magical feeling of being in Venice. I could have walked for days through the endless mazes, looking into the unique shops full of watercolors, Venetian glass and carnival masks. It was amazing to watch the incredible sunsets behind St. Mark's Basilica and the Doges' Palace. The water taxis and gondola rides provided a nice change from the trams and metro system in Milan.

Fager (right) and Stefania Rouselle, an Italian friend, take a break from holiday shopping along Via Vitton & Emmanuele and Piaza Duomo.

In November, a group of us escaped the rainy month in Milan to head five hours south to see the wonders of Rome. We were so taken by the beauty of Rome that on our first night there we lost track of time and missed the last subway. There's no complaining about a 1 a.m. stroll across the romantic streets of Rome, from the Trevi fountain to the youth hostel near the train station. For the rest of the time in Rome, we stayed with a family friend of Caroline's. It was fun to have an American mom cook us pancakes for breakfast and give us the insider's tourist guide to Rome. St. Peter's Square and the Sistine Chapel were magnificent sights to see in Vatican City. We had an incredible time walking among the ancient ruins and taking part in the infamous people-watching on the Spanish Steps.

My last trip in Italy was to Bologna, Modena and Parma, all within 24 hours. The cities are home to the oldest university, the Ferrari and parmagiano cheese, respectively. Our last stop was Parma and we arrived at 1 p.m.. Unfortunately, every shop in Italy is closed for the celebrated three-hour lunch period. At last, we discovered an open salumeria where we could buy vacuum-packed cheese to bring back to America. Realizing we would miss our train to Milan, the only thing to do was to relax and enjoy the short Italian lady singing away while she slowly packaged, wrapped and tied a bow on our precious parmagiano.

While many cultural aspects are different throughout Italy, soccer dominates the sports scene everywhere you go. There are two soccer teams in Milan, and I was curious about the fan base. The rivalry reminded me of the New York Yankees and the New York Mets, and it was beyond me as to why people rooted for each team. Finally, it was pointed out to me that it has nothing to do with geography—it is a tradition to root for the team your father cheers for. It was impossible to get tickets to Milan vs. Milan but we were lucky to get tickets when Rome came to town. I have been to all sorts of games and sporting events, but I have never seen fans as crazy as the ones at this soccer game. Controversial accusations abound that the Prime Minister, who is also the owner of the AC Milan team, "persuades" the referees to make more calls in Milan's favor. Judging by the havoc at the stadium after the game, the Romans did not find these accusations so outlandish and were not pleased with the loss.

As the weather gets colder, the Italians get a head start on the Christmas season. In the end of November, white lights and candles begin to adorn the city. The giant Christmas tree is placed in the 19th century shopping Galleria, and the ice skating rink is placed on the city's main piazza. With all of the decorations come the shopping festivities. The Milanese are very serious about their shopping, especially during the holidays. From Gucci and Versace to Fiorucci and Prada, the shopping streets are flooded with eager consumers during the holiday season. We didn't get the full experience of designer shopping in Milan due to some budget constraints, but we did take a trip to the designer outlets just north of the border in Switzerland. The town of Lugano had a wild cultural mix of Switzerland, Germany, France and Italy. Much to our disappointment, the outlets were just as worthless as they are back home. Even if it was only for a moment, at least we tried on Gucci shoes and placed the Prada bags on our arms.

Living in Milan and traveling throughout Italy has expanded my cultural views. In addition to learning about Italian culture, it was interesting to see my own country from a different perspective. As Americans, we felt very welcomed by the Italians we met at L'Università Cattolica. In our daily life, we found the Italians to be very friendly and willing to help while anxious to practice their English "hellos" and "goodbyes" with us. They were fascinated with American icons such as Bruce Springsteen, hamburgers and the president, and were eager to talk to us about the various subjects. Whether it was shopping in the Bennetons on every corner, finding our favorite gelato, strolling along the canal or performing at one of the historic churches, there was never a dull moment in Milan. I had an incredible experience living in Milan for the fall semester. I was surrounded by fascinating people, beautiful places and a whirlwind of culture. I am counting down the days until my return.

Students promote Asian awareness

Week includes a wide array of activities, including Iron Chef competition and gala

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell's (SAAB) annual Asian gala on Saturday, March 1 in Larison Dining Hall completed Asian Awareness Week with a bang.

The gala ran from 6-9 p.m., and guests enjoyed many aspects of Asian cuisine, dance and featured traditional ceremonies.

Asian Awareness Week was Feb. 24 through March 1, and the gala on Saturday night was just one event in a week's worth of cultural festivities.

The main attractions included Monday's sushi making in the Terrace room, Tuesday's Iron Chef competition in the Bostwick Dining Hall, Wednesday's comedian Eliot Chang in the Bison, Thursday's Asian pillow making in the Craft Center and Friday's tea and dance demonstration in the LC Cave.

Kang Tchou '05, a member of SAAB's executive board, believes that cultural events are important to the University community.

"Events like Asian Awareness Week and the Asian gala provide multicultural activities on campus to help promote the diversity of the University community," Tchou said.

During the gala, members of SAAB demonstrated Korean, Chinese, Laos, Vietnamese and Tibetan marriage proposals and marriage ceremonies.

Patty Alex '05, president of SAAB, said the weddings fit in well with the Asian Awareness week theme, "Many Faces of Asia."

"Often times, people who are rarely or never exposed to another culture, or even not very familiar with it, are least likely to be able to see the ceremonies which make up an intrinsic part of that cultural tradition," Alex said. "By having a wedding ceremony, we could show both similarities and differences between cultures, traditions not present in Western customs, and also show the different dress of various countries."

Guests were entertained during dinner by three dances performed by Jason Kim '04, SAAB dancers and South Asian Student Association (SASA) dancers.

The cuisine represented a variety of different cultures—Japanese, Chinese, Indonesian, Korean and Vietnamese dishes were enjoyed from appetizers through the main course served buffet style to desert. Many different dishes were presented and everyone had the opportunity to sample each dish.

Meghann Peace '04 performed with other SASA dancers.

"I love dancing. I'd never before done Indian dances, so I wanted to learn. I enjoyed meeting and getting to know everyone in the dance. We had a wonderful time learning it together. The dance was choreographed by a fellow student, Priya Gupta '06," Peace said.

Brian Fence '03, a SAAB member and guest at the gala, found the event to be enjoyable.

"As usual, SAAB dazzled me with its great food and entertainment," Fence said.

Brook Sopelsa '03 also felt that the gala was worthwhile.

"The SAAB dinner was a wonderful cultural experience. The food was delicious, and it was complimented by great performances," Sopelsa said.

Asian Awareness Week and the final gala were not only enjoyable for students, faculty and staff who participated, but the week's events were equally enjoyable for those helping to put them together for the University community.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Students get their food at SAAB's annual Asian Gala. This was the finale of many popular events held throughout the week of February 24 through March 1 this year.

"It was great to see members of SAAB coming together as a team. That group effort helped to bring something spectacular to campus; as a result, seeing guests enjoy themselves throughout the week was a truly rewarding experience," Tchou said.

Alex said that Asian Awareness week required a lot of hard work and planning by not only members of SAAB, but also their family, friends, SAAB alumni and other University organizations.

Preparations for the week begin months in advance, and the reservations are made a year prior.

Alex said the work was worthwhile because of the importance of the week for the University community.

"Cultural dinners are unique and special events and provide the opportunity for the hosting organization to share their cultures, backgrounds and experiences, while simultaneously allowing for the campus and Lewisburg communities to learn more about traditions and customs they may have limited access or exposure to," Alex said.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The South Asian Student Association (SASA) dancers perform a traditional dance to the delight of those that attended the dinner. In addition to three SASA dances, students and faculty who were at the dinner were able to view and learn from Korean, Chinese, Laos, Vietnamese and Tibetan marriage proposals and ceremonies.

To clone or not to clone

By Kyle Lange
Staff Writer

As the U.S. Senate debates a bill that would ban all cloning of humans or human embryos, it raises issues of the usefulness and morality of human cloning in any way, shape or form.

While most scientists and politicians would agree with a moratorium on human cloning, the most controversial aspect of the bill is the ban on cloning human embryos for research and therapeutic purposes. Human embryos are currently a valuable source of stem cells, which can serve many different purposes in the body.

The National Institute of Health (NIH) reports that stem cells are cells without a specific function that can divide and regenerate, eventually taking on a specific function in the body. One stem cell could, depending on which path it takes, differentiate into a group of heart cells, blood cells, bone cells, etc. This property makes stem cells potentially valuable for research.

Understanding the process of differentiation—what influences a stem cell to become a specific type of cell—is very important. According to the NIH, this research could lead to a better understanding of what causes cancer and birth defects, and eventually to more effective treatments.

Associate Professor of Biology Marie Pizzorno said stem cells could directly be used for therapeutic purposes.

"You could use stem cells to grow tissues in a lab, and replace diseased or dead tissue in someone's body," Pizzorno said. "It might even be possible to use them to create new organs for a person's body, since there is always a shortage of organ donors."

According to the NIH, stem cells "offer the possibility of a renewable source of replacement cells and tissues to treat diseases including Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases, spinal cord injury, stroke, burns, heart disease, diabetes, osteoarthritis and rheumatoid arthritis."

Embryonic stem cells are particularly valuable to scientists because of their availability and flexibility. While adult stem cells are difficult to obtain and can only differentiate into certain types of cells, embryonic stem cells are easily harvested and can differentiate into any cell type.

The embryonic stem cells currently used are those left over from in vitro fertilization and other reproductive techniques. While cloning human embryos is not currently possible, there are signs that this soon could change. The Journal of Regenerative Medicine reported that scientists working for Advanced Cell Technology succeeded in cloning a human embryo that progressed to the six-cell stage of division but no further. It took 71 eggs from seven volunteers just to produce one embryo of this kind.

While embryonic stem cells have much to offer in the way of tissue transplant and research, the morality of using and cloning embryos becomes an issue.

"The question is, 'Does this embryo have rights?'" Associate Professor of Biology John Tonzetich said. "Embryonic stem cells are harvested before day 10, long before the nervous system is formed on day 14."

MacArthur Chair of Judaic Studies Rivka Ulmer said there are religious objections to embryonic cloning.

"In most Jewish circles, embryonic cloning would not be allowed," Ulmer said. "That would be interfering with the divine process of creation."

Beyond embryonic cloning, there is the issue of human cloning. This has garnered much attention in recent months due to the Raelian cult group which claims to have cloned humans. Most scientists are skeptical of these claims, as no human embryos have been cloned beyond the six-cell stage.

Yet if the technology were developed to clone humans, would this ever serve any useful purpose? Tonzetich sees a place for human cloning in the future.

"In this country, where we have the notion of reproductive rights, for women who could reproduce in no other way, cloning might be an option," Tonzetich said.

But would human cloning be healthy? Dolly, the world's first cloned sheep recently died at the age of 6, compared to the normal sheep lifespan of 10 years. BioMedNet reported that a recent experiment in Japan showed cloned mice to have a much shorter lifespan than naturally born mice.

Health problems in cloned animals arise from the cloning of adult DNA. DNA gets damaged during its lifetime. When it is cloned and injected into an embryo, it does not act as embryonic DNA. It still carries the wear and tear of many years of replication. This can affect the strength of the immune system or cause the body to malfunction.

Cloning humans or human embryos for any useful purpose seems to be beyond our current technology and many oppose the idea on moral grounds.

The University's biology department is not currently involved in research on human cloning, nor is it likely to be in the future.

"I seriously doubt that Bucknell University would ever do any research on human cloning," Tonzetich said.

Lysistrata Project shows lessons of the past

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

The ancient Greek playwright Aristophanes' "The Lysistrata" was first performed in 411 B.C.E. The political comedy had a recent revival at the University and around the world.

It was performed at the University on March 3 in conjunction with Lysistrata Project, which consisted of 1,059 readings of "The Lysistrata" in 59 countries and all 50 U.S. states.

The Lysistrata Project organized the worldwide readings as a way to spread the peaceful message of the work and protest war. Aristophanes originally wrote "The Lysistrata" to promote peace in Athens during the Peloponnesian War.

"It was compelling to me to see the play being used in 2003 for the same purpose it had been used 2415 years ago, to provoke discussion and reflection on issues of war, peace and human relations," Associate Professor of Classics Janet Jones said.

Instead of using tragedy to relay his message, Aristophanes used comedy to make his political statement, according to Jones.

> "It was compelling to me to see the play being used in 2003 for the same purpose it had been used 245 years ago, to provoke discussion and reflection on issues of war, peace and human relations."
> —Janet Jones, associate professor of classics

"Comedy was social commentary through the lampooning of specific notable citizens and with reference to specific current events. 'The Lysistrata' expressed the urgent desire for peace that most felt by this point in the war, but through compromise, not by putting Athens into any real risk of losing," Jones said.

Students, faculty, staff and community members formed a cast of 23 and had only one two-hour rehearsal prior to the performance. According to Jones, Associate Professor of Theatre and Dance Robert Gainer organized the group during this rehearsal and helped them transform a dry reading of the play into a hysterical and lively performance.

The play begins with Lysistrata, played by Liisa Britt '04, an Athenian woman who has called a meeting of women from the different states of Greece. She has a plan to end the war—to deny men sex until they sign peace treaties. This plan would require all women to remain celibate.

Lysistrata also organizes a female takeover of the Acropolis, preventing the men from accessing the war money.

The comedic element was largely based on the sexual innuendo throughout the play and the acting of the performers. In a dialogue between Lysistrata and Cleonice, played by Ibby Cizmar '03, Lysistrata states that she fears for their sex. The response from Cleonice was, "So do I, it's been ages."

The play's comedy did not overshadow its message. The ending showed the men compromising and using diplomacy instead of war to achieve peace.

Emily Thede '04 enjoyed both the comedic aspects and the underlying message.

"The Lysistrata Project was wildly entertaining with its satirical political impressions and exaggerated portrayal of human sexual desire. Through humor it reveals many underlying issues," Thede said. "It recognizes the power that women can exert when they unite forces and it reveals how men can become entangled in war and lose sight of their true cause. Although it was written thousands of years ago, it addresses issues that resonate with the current world situation."

Barry DeSain '04 played the role of a Spartan civilian in "The Lysistrata." He felt that the Lysistrata Project was apropos to the current world situation, which was evident from the number of productions worldwide.

"The way that the number of performances grew so quickly reflected how people around the world are looking for some way to protest this war," DeSain said.

Jones said that the ensemble enjoyed working together on the production and that it was a rewarding experience for them.

"Everyone had a blast on many different levels—the fun of working hard to put something meaningful together brought everyone close together, the classics students were struck by the relevancy of the play that a mere reading in a class at any random time would never have captured, and many of us were led by a desire for real and meaningful reflection about what we are about to embark upon as a nation," Jones said.

Trip to Washington, D.C., relieves blues

Melinda Kummer—The Bucknellian

Tourists relax as they look across the Washington, D.C., mall at the Washington Monument. ACE will be sponsoring a trip to D.C. on March 29 during the National Cherry Blossom Festival.

By Melinda Kummer
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Are you suffering from homework headache, sniffling bouts, or cabin fever? If these symptoms seem familiar then perhaps some fresh spring air in Washington, D.C. could cure your midterm blues. With an Activities and Campus Events (ACE) sponsored bus trip Saturday, March 29, relief could be yours sooner than you thought.

The bus trip, timed perfectly in the middle of the National Cherry Blossom Festival, offers inexpensive transportation to the nation's capital. After reserving your bus ticket at the Campus Activities & Programs (CAP) Center (LC 306), you could easily check out the festival calendar at the festival Web site, www.nationalcherryblossomfestival.org.

The festival, which starts tomorrow and lasts until April 7, incorporates multicultural events and traditional events such as the annual parade. The largest spectator-drawing event in D.C., the National Cherry Blossom Parade will march down Constitution Ave. at 9:30 a.m. on March 29.

Other weekends include many highlights as well. The wind of spring promises to be perfect for the 37th Annual Smithsonian Kite Festival from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on March 22, located on the National Mall between Fourth and Seventh Streets. For a taste of Japanese culture, the Sakura Matsuri provides entertainment as the largest Japanese street festival in the United States. The event will occur on April 5 and will be located on 12th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue.

Diehard blossom enthusiasts might want to wait until after the festival to venture for a peek at the beautiful trees since the National Park Service is predicting the blossoms will not peak until the week of April 8-14.

Those not attracted to D.C. for its natural beauty might be interested in the several museums located within a quick walk of metro stations. The National Museum of American History (located at 14th Street and Constitution Avenue) is showing a special collection documenting the Sept. 11 attacks. The National Gallery of Art and its Sculpture Garden, located on the National Mall between Third and Ninth streets at Constitution Avenue now boasts sculpture galleries. Pieces by Auguste Rodin and Edgar Degas act as centerpieces to the collection. The Ernst Kirchner exhibit would also prove to be well worth a visitor's while.

Other museum information can be found at www.si.edu and the best part of visiting these museums is the price—free!

If relaxation is your only goal, the green lawn of the mall invites the weary to rest while taking in the beauty of the capital. Riding the festive merry-go-round beside the Hirshhorn's sculpture garden, eating a picnic by the Washington Monument or playing ultimate Frisbee by the Reflecting Pool can all prove therapeutic to students tired of the school routine.

Convenient location and plenty of low-priced activities, a trip to Washington could be the key to remedying even the most severe cases of can't-wait-for-summer colds.

Cap and Dagger revived

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

Though its name is rarely heard around campus, Cap and Dagger is one of the University's oldest student organizations. Within the past few years, organization members have tried to revive the club. Now under new leadership, Cap and Dagger is making and effort to renew its recognition on campus.

"We've started planning and seeking interest for a number of new activities," Vice President Hollie Barattolo '04 said. "There seems to be more drive from all of the officers and members to make next year the year for Cap and Dagger. We'd like to get more involved both on campus and in the community."

Cap and Dagger will be sponsoring an open-stage night on April 17, for which anyone can display a talent.

Barattolo is looking forward to the open-stage night showcase performance.

"Anyone who wants to sing, act, tell jokes or prance about is more than welcome to come on out," Barattolo said.

The following night, Kim Klauder '05 will be presenting a cabaret show, co-sponsored by the club.

"Cap and Dagger is trying to incorporate more musical theater into its program," Klauder said. "Music is part of theater, too, which is why [the club] is sponsoring my show."

Klauder's performance will be her fifth cabaret, an hour-long one-woman show. The cabaret is entitled "Stressed Out" and will include both modern music and musical theater. Tickets for the performance are free to the public.

Cap and Dagger's new leadership includes President Kristen Habacht '05, Barattolo, Secretary Ashi Day '04, Treasurer Rachel Slotcavage '04 and Music Chair Klauder. The club's adviser is Associate Professor of Theater Robert Gainer.

Local string quartet gives Classical concert

❖ Concert Review

The Central Pennsylvania String Quartet gave a touching performance the night of Tuesday, March 4. The recital was given in the Natalie Davis Rooke Recital Hall.

Each of the pieces presented that night highlighted the unique sound of woodwinds, which is rounder and richer than many ensembles. The group was made up of Cristal Janderchick on flute, Jill Marchione on oboe, French horn player Jane E'del, Carol Scott on bassoon, music department faculty member Ella Forsyth on clarinet and accompanist Galen Deibler on piano.

Most of the compositions were written during the 19th century, or the Romantic period. The first of these pieces was "Passacaille for Wind Quartet," by the relatively unfamiliar composer Adrien Barthe. This short piece began the evening with a warm and lyrical sound.

Gordon Jacob's "Sextet," made up of five unique and contrasting movements, followed "Passacaille." The first, "Elegiac Prelude," alternated between sections highlighting the winds and the piano, with an almost brooding sound throughout. Perhaps this tone was due to Jacob's intentions for the piece—as a tribute and memorial. According to the program notes collected by Forsyth, "The sextet was written in memory of Aubrey Brain, the great horn player and father of the equally distinguished Dennis Brain. Very shortly after its first performance by the Dennis Brain Ensemble, Dennis Brain was killed in a motor accident. The work can therefore be regarded as a double tribute to the memory of father and son." This is perhaps the reason for the overlying dark mood that the piece reflected.

"Sextet" then moved to the quicker and more dramatic movement, "Scherzo." This title refers to a dance, so its quicker feel was appropriate. It still retained the dark mood characteristic of the prior movement. Several instruments were highlighted in the next movement, "Cortege," including a beginning solo in the clarinet. While different instruments soloed above, the bass remained the same in a repeating ostinato line. "Minuet and Trio," a fugue-like movement came next, leading to the last movement of the piece, "Rondo with Epilogue." This finished "Sextet" as it had begun, with the melodramatic sense of dark melancholy that all the movements had had.

A more renowned composer's work than those previously performed was featured next on the program. Beethoven's Quintet in E-flat Major, Op. 16 consisted of three movements, "Grave-Allegro ma non troppo," "Andante cantabile" and "Rondo-Allegro, ma non troppo." All three were classical in sound. Beethoven modeled this quintet after a similar one written by Mozart, and even highlighted the music of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" within the piece. As Mozart composed wholly within the Classical Era, this is apparent in the classical sound of "Quintet." The piece was also much longer than anything else performed that night.

The first movement featured a short reccurring theme or motive. It also included a repetition of half, or deceptive, cadences, tricking the listener into a false ending. The second movement was sweeter and more lyrical than the first. This section also highlighted the French horn in a rich solo. The third and final movement had an obvious dance feel, although large sections were played in minor, making it feel heavier than the previous two sections.

The evening ended with a perky performance of Ludwig Thuille's Sextet in B-flat Major, Op. 6. This piece had an almost comical melody that was tripping and seemed full of character.

All six local performers gave a short but pleasant show, exemplifying the variety of composers and styles with their unique ensemble.

Multigenre reading is a double-header

By Melinda Kummer

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Well-known essayist and short story writer Susan Rogers reads at Bucknell Hall on March 4. The reading from Rogers and Marilyn Mumford, presidential professor of English emeritus was sponsored by the Office of LGBT Aswareness and the Stader Center for Poetry.

Mermen and college life in the 1950s met at the multigenre readings held before spring break. Marilyn Mumford and Susan Fox Rogers read at the afternoon reading on March 4, which focused on Mumford's vivid writings about a mother and dying child. The evening reading at Bucknell Hall paired Pit Menousek Pinegar '63 with Tom Rogers, who is Susan Rogers' father.

Mumford, presidential professor of English emeritus, and Susan Rogers, a well-known essayist and short story writer, drew a full house. A most intriguing piece, Mumford read of a mother's reaction to her baby whose legs were fused so he looked like a mermaid. A sad and yet warm piece, the descriptions of the "little merman" touched the audience as the theme focused on longing for a soul.

Along with students, several professors attended the mulitgenre event.

"I thought Professor Mumford's fiction reading was especially interesting. I loved the story she read. Not only was it well-crafted and quite moving, but it also displayed the uncommon ability to represent working-class characters in a way that was sympathetic and insightful, instead of romanticized or condescending," Associate Professor of English Saundra Morris said.

Mumford and Susan Rogers' readings were sponsored by the Office of LGBT Awareness and the Stadler Center for Poetry.

The evening readings featured Pinegar, an author of two books of poetry and a teacher at the Greater Hartford Academy of the Arts, and Tom Rogers, professor of English emeritus of Penn State University and author of four novels. Pinegar's intense and beautiful poetry juxtaposed Tom Rogers' comic reading of his new novel "Jerry Engels."

Tom Rogers has several connections at the University.

"Tom is a former professor of mine, a former neighbor and a friend. He's a wonderful writer and very funny," said Alan Janesch, associate director of communications.

The excerpt from "Jerry Engels" described what life was like for college men in the 1950s. Ironically enough, little has changed in the party and relationship scene and students only found the '50s vernacular to enhance the comedy of the story.

"I really found it to be amusing. This is the kind of novel every college student should read because we can all relate to the main characters on so many different levels," Tammana Hye '04 said.

In an Associated Press State & Local Wire on July 2, 2002, Tom Rogers explained that he had difficulty finding someone willing to publish his book.

"There's been a real change in tastes and strategies in the publishing world," the 75-year-old man said. "Young writers, they'll take a chance on. But a writer my age, they want something that they're sure is going to work commercially. A novel set in State College, Pa., in some fraternity world in 1951-52 ... What are we going to do with something like this?"

With the help of his daughter, Susan, Tom Rogers contacted Xlibris, a high-tech vanity publisher, to print the novel. Xlibris now offers books that can be made to order because they are printed with a form of laser printing.

The evening reading was sponsored by the Department of Music, the Association for the Arts and the Stadler Center for Poetry.

Three students arrested for alleged assault of student

Students taken into custody in front of class

By Michelle Dombeck

Three University students were arrested on Tuesday for allegedly assaulting another University student last Friday. Two of these students were taken out from a class and arrested in plain view of their peers.

Dennis Geraghty '03, Eric Storm '03 and Luis Davila '03 were arrested and charged with aggravated assault, simple assault, recklessly endangering another person and criminal conspiracy to commit these offenses, according to the Lewisburg Borough Police Department.

The victim was assaulted at around 2:30 a.m. on St. George Street after a prior confrontation with the suspects on South 7th Street, police said. The victim also received medical attention at Evangelical Hospital and was later released.

Storm and Davila were in their Humanities 450 class when two armed police officers and a public safety officer knocked on the classroom door around 1:15 p.m. on Tuesday. After asking the instructor of the class, Assistant Professor of Comparative Humanities John Hunter, two confirmed that Storm and Davila were present in class, the officers asked to see the students in private.

After the students talked briefly in the hall with the police officers,

Fifty new parking spots added for student use

By Jennifer Jenchura

Bucknell Student Government (BSG) has negotiated 50 new student parking spaces available in the uphill farm lot following immediately after spring break. The new spaces are not a permanent solution since the new spots will be terminated once construction on Dana Engineering begins at the end of the semester.

> "BSG decided to pursue the issue because parking was one of the biggest student concerns last semester."

> —Marissa Schmidt '05, BSG student affairs committee chair

Student parking in the farm lot should be available until May, but Director of Procurement Services and Chair of the University Parking Committee Don Krech offers alternative suggestions to the parking problems.

"The old farm lot solution is, unfortunately, only temporary. As soon as construction begins we will lose those spaces. At this date, it looks like construction may not begin until May. The upper stadium lot continues to remain underutilized. It might help to publicize that the lot is there," Krech said. "One other aspect of the redesignation of lots is that the Smith Hall/ROTC lot will soon (estimated time mid-April) become entirely students-only. A new lot is being constructed next to the Recreation and Athletic Center for staff and visitors, freeing up the entire current row of parking, currently reserved for staff."

BSG became aware of how much students disliked the campus parking sit-

Zeta Phi Beta joins Greek community

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

The University's already large Greek community has just added a new sorority. Zeta Phi Beta has become the eighth and youngest sorority on this campus. Joining seven already well-established sororities at the University, Zeta Phi Beta seeks to make a name for itself on campus.

Coming to the University just after Tau Kappa Epsilon's return after a three-year hiatus, Zeta Phi Beta hopes for an easy transition. While Tau Kappa Epsilon has succeeded after facing an uphill battle in competing with fraternities that have been around for decades, the newest addition to the University's sorority life faces some hurdles.

Jakita Price '04 is the current president and one of four student founders of the University chapter. Price, along with Nicole Thompson '04, Jasmine James '04 and Alisha Lang '03, started the reactivation process a year ago when they expressed an interest in starting a new sorority at Bucknell.

"After researching all of our options, we decided that Zeta Phi Beta Sorority Inc. would be most beneficial to the University and its future participants," Price said.

> "Anyone can join a Greek organization, but when you are the creators, you have a special bond that can never be broken."

The four Bucknell students were not alone in starting the chapter. The Harrisburg graduate chapter of Zeta Phi Beta, Nu Sigma Zeta, was involved in the activation of the University chapter.

In addition former Pennsylvania director of Zeta Phi Beta Sorority Inc. Yolanda Goodwin and Shauna Irwin, the University director of sorority affairs, aided the process. The brothers of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity have also been influential to the students involved in Zeta Phi Beta.

Sehon '00 and Bronfenbrenner '00 will run more than 3,200 miles to chase a dream

By Evan Honeyfield

Most throw away youthful desires and dreams upon graduation to climb the corporate ladder and "get ahead in life." Occasionally a midlife crisis brings the dreams flooding back, putting pressure to follow the yearning or to stay with the safety of a job and family. But, who would quit a solid job at the age of 25, just two and a half years out of college, for an adventure most would consider insane? And what would drive anyone to leave the safety of health insurance and a serious girlfriend? Meet Dave Bronfenbrenner and Scott Sehon, both University graduates of the Class of 2000.

Bronfenbrenner and Sehon quit their jobs in February to run across the United States. This five-month adventure grew from a vision planted by a three-week road trip across the United States after their first year at the University.

Café to open on first floor of library in April

By Jennifer Jenchura

A new café facility will open in April on the first floor of the Bertrand Library as a replacement for the Bison Express food trailer that used to be located on the east side of the academic quad next to the library. The facility will be stationed between the circulation and technology desks. Drinks and prepackaged food items will be available for sale and there will be café seating in the back section of the first floor of the library.

The menu will feature drinks similar to other campus dining venues, and Dining Services will be interested in feedback regarding the menu options.

"Some items will be similar to 7th Street Café in the way of hot drinks; however, the rest of the menu will be different from other locations. Baked goods, salads, sandwiches, etc. will be varied and different from most other locations. We will also be looking for suggestions from the customers to make improvements as we go along. It will not be offering grilled or fried items on the menu, however," General Manager of Dining Services Tim Tenon said.

Construction of engineering building to begin in spring

Construction of a new engineering building will begin late this spring and will be built on the grass lot next to the staff parking lot located behind the west wing of the Dana Engineering Building.

Staff Writer

Major changes will once again be seen on campus as the construction of a new engineering building will begin in late spring. According to James Orbison, dean of the College of Engineering, this plan has been under consideration for three years, and will soon be implemented now that the final design was completed last month.

"The design of the building is complete and the project is in the final stages of securing bid pricing," Associate Vice President for Facilities of Physical Plant Dennis Hawley said.

The new building will be located behind the west wing of Dana, on the grass lot next to the staff parking lot and nudging up against that lot. The minimum distance between the new building and the Phi Psi Fraternity house will be a little over 100 feet.

According to Orbison, the engineering programs have been housed in Dana for almost 75 years, but over the past 20 years, there have been many fundamental changes in the degree programs and how courses are conducted.

"These projects require project and group collaboration space beyond anything needed before. Classrooms are at a premium ... and the college is very short on faculty and staff offices and student activity spaces," Orbison said.

The construction of this new engineering building has received a great deal of attention due to its impact on Fraternity Road.

According to Orbison, the impact should be relatively minor. The road in front of Phi Psi will become a dead end just west of the house's driveway, but there will still be a connection to allow for through traffic.

The University faculty and staff parking lot between Lambda Chi and Phi Psi fraternities will be reconfigured for two-way traffic on the side nearest Lambda Chi, and traffic on Fraternity Road will run through there and behind Phi Psi to Seventh Street.

"None of the fraternity houses will be lost to the project, or will access to or parking for them be affected."

"None of the fraternity houses will be lost to the project, or will access to or parking for them be affected," Orbison said.

New traffic patterns will indeed be created and utilized, and will undoubtedly take some time for students to become acquainted with.

"Although there will be a need to get used to the new traffic patterns ... all of these changes work because of the careful long-term planning accomplished by the entire campus, including students," Hawley said.

"We continue to look at the new emerging traffic patterns as well as those already established, in a unified and consistent way that allows us to thoughtfully grow into our Campus Development Plan," Director of Construction and Design James Hostetler said.

According to Hostetler, one major downfall of Dana is that it is not easily adaptable to evolving uses. The structural systems make removing some interior walls difficult and expensive. With the construction of a new building, its design will have an outside shell built for a 75-plus year life cycle with interior walls that are more easily modified as teaching styles and technology continue to evolve.

"The new building has been designed deliberately to permit extensive space reallocation within it well into the future. Utilities, including a reasonable heating, ventilating and air-conditioning system, have also been designed to support interior changes without great cost," Orbison said.

According to Orbison, the total construction cost of the project, which includes "soft costs" (architectural and engineering design fees, permit fees, etc.) is expected to be under $8 million.

All of the funds for the building construction have come from donors, and University Relations staff continues to fundraise in order to close in on the goal.

From commencement this spring to completion, construction is expected to take 14 months.

"I believe when this facility comes online, it will be a beautiful and highly functional asset, taking its rightful place in our campus tapestry," Hostetler said.

they came back in, collected their belongings and followed the police officers outside of the building, according to Hunter.

Once outside, the students were arrested. Classmate John Nuzum '03 said that, through the window, he was able to see "them walking in handcuffs."

Hunter said that he "hoped the police had cause," but that the event was "needlessly public and humiliating."

The three suspects were arraigned before Justice Leo S. Armbruster of Lewisburg Pa. They posted $10,000 bail and were released.

Police said that a preliminary hearing was scheduled for April 10 at 2 p.m., but declined to comment further on the arrest, incident, or current whereabouts of the students.

Zeta Phi Beta becomes eighth recognized University sorority

all had an equal influence in this journey. All of the proposals and presentations to Bucknell administrators and advisers in the Zeta Phi Beta Inc organization were collaborative works. I can speak for all of us when I say that having Zeta Phi Beta recognized after a 20-plus year hiatus from Bucknell gives us a sense of accomplishment," said Price. "Anyone can join a Greek organization, but when you are the creators, you have a special bond that can never be broken; a part of you is with that chapter and everyone will remember you for that."

"COGL, CCA, and the Panhellenic Council have all been in support of a new sorority. I believe that people on campus are aware that there is another option of Greek Life for women who are interested in joining a sorority."
—Jakita Price '04*

There are officially no members of the upstart sorority besides the four founders because the Membership Intake Process (MIP) has not ended yet, so it has not produced any members of the sorority. There is still time for it to attract new members.

The founding members are confident they will find sorority sisters, especially due to the response Zeta Phi Beta has received from other organizations and Greek chapters on campus.

"COGL [Council on Greek Life], CCA [Campus and Complimentary Activities] and the Panhellenic Council have all been in support of a new sorority. I believe that people on campus are aware that there is another option of Greek Life for women who are interested in joining a sorority. Once the chapter has established its members this semester, Zeta Phi Beta will play an influential role in Greek Affairs," Price said.

Zeta Phi Beta Inc. has been a well-established and recognized sorority nationwide since 1920. It was founded at Howard University in Washington, D.C., and has continued to grow.

According to its national Web site, "Zeta Phi Beta Sorority was founded on the simple belief that sorority elitism and socializing should not overshadow the real mission for progressive organizations—to address societal mores, ills, prejudices, poverty and health concerns of the day."

The University's newest sorority has also chronicled a number of firsts. Zeta Phi Beta was the first Greek-letter organization to charter a chapter in Africa, form adult and youth auxiliary groups, centralize its operations in a national headquarters and be constitutionally bound to a fraternity, Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Inc.

Since the sorority's inception, Zeta Phi Beta has chartered hundreds of chapters not just bound to the United States and initiated thousands of women. Now Bucknell women can join in this tradition.

Jakita Price has plans to see the Bucknell chapter grow. She said, "if I am selected to take part in the Membership Intake Process (MIP) and complete the MIP, I plan on doing a lot of public relations work with not only the Greek organizations but all organizations on campus.

In addition, by working with Lewisburg and surrounding communities, the University would ultimately open more lines of communication and strengthen ties that could make for a welcoming environment."

Zeta Phi Beta now joins Alpha Chi Omega, Chi Omega, Delta Delta Delta, Delta Gamma, Kappa Alpha Theta, Kappa Kappa Gamma, and Pi Beta Phi as the recognized sororities on campus. It is already an integral part to the Greek community and its presence on campus will only get bigger.

Cowan master plan proposed for extended student, faculty usage

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Eight miles west of here lies a 41-acre property covered in undisturbed forest and bordered by two rivers. A lodge, a caretaker's residence and a pavilion are the only existing structures on this University-owned land, commonly referred to as Cowan. A master plan was recently revealed to provide a larger projected use for students, faculty, staff and alumni, while maintaining the natural, remote and rustic atmosphere.

The grounds, formally known as the Forrest D. Brown Conference Center, are rented out to various student and faculty groups on campus for retreats and recreational purposes. Residential Colleges, athletic teams, sororities, fraternities and religious organizations are only some of the groups that rent these facilities.

According to Director of Reservation Information and Conference Services Judy Mickanis, the original charter dedicated this place to the "cultural, social and religious development of Bucknell students."

The University purchased the land in 1936. The lodge was constructed in 1956 and was enlarged-

A master renovation plan is in the works for Cowan, the 41-acre property owned by the University. Different parts of the property will be used for various programs including the Buck Wild orientation program. The new plans ininclude new buildings, new picnic areas and ropes course.

ment in 1968. Aside from the Picnic Pavilion erected in the 1970s, the facilities have undergone only minor updates.

The master plan for Cowan includes the renovation of the pre-existing lodge and caretaker's residence with the addition of many other structures.

"I've been here 16 years and this is probably the most exciting project," Director of Construction and Design Jim Hostetler said.

"We didn't just want to look at what we've got there now and focus on improving that," Hostetler said. "But we wanted to look at what really would benefit Bucknell. You've got an opportunity in this 41 acres to bring together students, faculty, staff and even alumni in certain ways."

Throughout the entire process, student and faculty input has been valued. The design team, Spillman Farmer Architects and Derck & Edson Associates, carried out a needs assessment project, which involved a number of student- and faculty-based organizations. The University also requested the opinions of the general student body by placing comment sheets in the Langone Center, where students could express their views and concerns.

"We talked about what we really liked about it and what we wanted to preserve," Hostetler said.

University Chaplain Ian Oliver said that overall, students were pleased with the grounds, but the bunkrooms and kitchen were in need of renovation.

The Steering Committee in charge of this project found that students liked the rustic, natural atmosphere of Cowan.

As stated in the executive summary of the plan, "The master plan for the conference center is one characterized by balance. The lodge will be updated and enlarged, but in a way that preserves the charm and desired rustic qualities. The site will be used for multiple activities, but these will be organized so that separation is maintained between groups, and the feeling of a retreat continues."

The master plan also emphasizes an environmentally sensitive approach.

Hostetler mentioned that the construction of new facilities would attempt to preserve the natural environment in the best way possible, without taking down very many trees in the process.

Even the structures would be ecologically sound. The architectural plans foresee six cabins to be built on stilts and the mini-lodge to be built around the existing trees, causing a low environmental impact.

The master plan also maps out the possibility of creating a ropes course, with high and low ropes, more picnic facilities, tent platforms and the construction of a Creek Room to overlook the flowing water.

Pathways throughout the wooded areas are also outlined in the master plan for Cowan.

"Buck Wild was sending students five hours away to go to Connecticut to do things we can do right here. I'd like to see us locate the Buck Wild program here, Hostetler said.

The ropes course would provide a location for team-building skills and the tent platforms would secure a solid foundation for students set up their tents and tarps.

In order to preserve the sense of remoteness valued in the plan, each new facility would be located at opposite ends of the grounds so that multiple groups may enjoy the property at the same time without the awareness of other groups.

These new facilities would maximize the use of Cowan without taking away from the feeling of an isolated retreat, Hostetler said.

The plan also aims to maintain the outdoors atmosphere inside the buildings, possibly by replacing the outdated furniture with chairs resembling tree limbs. There is the possibility of creating glass walls, as well, to present a more open view of the environment outside.

Although the master plan was published in November 2002, construction of these facilities will not begin until adequate funding has been received.

"We didn't just want to look at what we've got there now and focus on improving that. But we wanted to look at what really would benefit Bucknell. You've got an opportunity in this 41 acres to bring together students, faculty staff and even alumni in certain ways."

New spaces allotted for student use

uation during the fall of last semester and then took steps to work with the University Parking Committee to give students an opportunity to voice concerns and try to work toward a solution.

"BSG decided to pursue the issue because parking was one of the biggest student concerns last semester. Early in the year we held 'Make Bucknell Better Week' in hopes of getting feedback from students about what they wanted to see changed on campus. The Student Affairs Committee then based our projects for the year on the feedback from that week," BSG Student Affairs Committee Chair Marissa Schmidt '05 said. "The shortage of parking on campus was the biggest complaint. We knew from our own trouble with parking that the farm lot went greatly unused, so we put together a project to prove to the parking committee that those empty spots should be converted."

Next BSG took steps to make a convincing case to the administration by photographing the farm lot showing empty the spaces at various times of the day.

"Dozens of spaces in the farm lot parking were not being used by the faculty. Students who parked there were getting ticketed. So, in order to get our point across, we decided to take photos of the lot at various times throughout the day to illustrate how empty it usually was," Schmidt said. "The numerous photos would make our case really strong for getting the point across and show that it was an issue we really cared about since we put the effort in before."

BSG Vice President of Operations Jack Phillips '04 began the student investigation immediately.

"After the idea of documenting the empty parking spaces in the farm lot came up, I decided to get a jumpstart on the project. I started the next day by taking pictures of the empty parking spaces in the farm lot," Phillips said. "I would walk to the library in between classes where I would check out a digital camera for 20 minutes at a time. I did this two or three times a day for about a week. I started work on a PowerPoint presentation to show all the pictures that I had taken. I then handed the project off to Marissa and her committee."

BSG realized that there were always empty parking spaces in the farm lot, but the spaces were not available student use. BSG then presented its research to the committee.

"We took pictures for several days in a row at the same time, three times a day, and then compiled those pictures and turned them into a PowerPoint. It was a pretty convincing argument. There were always essentially 50 spots open, and if there were cars in that half of the lot, they either belonged to students or were unmarked," Schmidt said.

After the investigation Phillips contacted Krech. To the frustration of BSG, the parking committee was already aware of the problem.

"It was disappointing to learn that the parking committee knew about that problem and were planning on using those spaces for construction vehicles once Dana construction began tentatively at spring break," BSG President Katy Timer said. "Since that has not begun yet, the parking committee agreed with us that students ought to be able to use those spots, so all 50 were changed into student parking. However, they will become faculty parking spots again once construction begins because the [construction] vehicles will be parking in other faculty spots that are currently being used in the farm lot. But, we're hoping once construction for Dana is over, they will be reconverted to student parking again."

Once Phillips contacted Krech, the committee quickly took action and was readily agreed with BSG's recommendations.

"Jack sent me an e-mail saying that it seems as if there are always empty spots in the old farm lot. He asked if we could designate them to students, knowing that the Dana project could start at anytime. I sent e-mails to the committee. Every member agreed that Jack's proposal made sense. So we arranged to have the extra spots designated for students," Krech said. "The comforting part is Jack didn't have to send us proposal, fill out any forms, meet with scores of people (until he found the right one) or even make his case in person. He made a simple, logical request. We agreed and quickly took action."

The committee often receives complaints centered around the University parking system.

"One of the biggest complaints we receive is that we have an extremely confusing parking system and way too many signs. So we have tried to designate, wherever possible, entire lots for strictly student or strictly faculty/staff parking. It would enable everyone to easily discern if they could park in a lot. It would also make it easier for Public Safety to enforce the regulations," Krech said. "We began that project last spring. Consequently, we were able to designate the new farm lot as strictly for students. We realized that the old farm lot would have extra spaces, but we were basing our plan on the anticipated start date of the Dana extension; the start date was late winter '03. That obviously didn't happen."

Although BSG has made great strides in finding student parking spots for the upperclassmen eligible to have cars on campus, they warn that it is only a quick fix. Once the Dana expansion is started, the faculty will need those spots, as construction will displace much of their parking spaces.

"The solution is not permanent, as the spots will revert to faculty parking when the Dana expansion construction begins. However, the construction will most likely not begin for another five to seven weeks, so students should be able to make use of the new spots through the end of the semester. Don Krech greatly facilitated the transition of the parking spaces to student parking spaces. He deserves great thanks," Phillips said.

With the effort that went into the changes, the University administration is aware of the strong student concerns with the parking issue.

"I'm actually quite proud that we were given the spots. It seems like a small, insignificant battle, but we wanted to accomplish tangible things for Bucknell students, and we wanted to make sure we addressed things that were of primary concern on campus," Schmidt said.

After the 50 new farm lot spots are eliminated, BSG is ready to work hard to gain more student parking in the future.

"When we all return to campus in the fall, we will take stock of the student parking situation and BSG will make appeals as they are needed. For now, however, these extra spots are definitely a success," Phillips said.

Café to open in Bertrand Library

Resources [ISR] mentioned café plans in its strategic plan, and the University Library Committee endorsed the concept and recommended that the facility be placed in the library's main section rather than in the 24-hour access computer lab.

"We will place eight tables with chairs in the rear of the first floor for people to use as café seating. In the best of all worlds, people who use these facilities will clean up after themselves, and hopefully we can expect others to apply a little peer pressure to help remind folks. The Dining Services folks who operate the café will also help to keep the café seating clean," Associate Vice President for ISR Gene Spencer '76 said.

In addition to various locations within the library, other uphill locations were considered as potential uphill eating spots, including Swartz Hall.

"Because space is an issue, we originally were going to put a mobile kitchen outside the library on the Swartz Hall side. Because of appearance concerns, we knew from the beginning that ideally a permanent location inside a busy building would be best," Tenon said. "In talking with various people on campus, the library was looked at as an option. We looked at a few different locations in the library; however, because of issues like construction costs, disruption, accessibility, utilities, we decided on the area next to the tech desk. My hope is that we can start at least limited operations by around April 15 or so. It could be later that week, but that is the goal right now."

The new café is a permanent solution to the idea of an uphill eatery.

"I'm really excited about the recent progress with the uphill eatery as a permanent solution in the library. I think having an indoors station is much more useful for students already studying in the library, and it would also be better during colder weather months," Bucknell Student Government (BSG) President Katy Timer '04 said.

The main difference between the outside trailer eatery and the library café is location.

"Would a trailer on the edge of the academic quad really fit into the beauty of this campus?" Spencer said. "I'd rather have the facility within the library where it can add to the comfort of using our services and also keep the quad pristine."

BSG has been working for some time with Student Activities and Dining Services on a proposal for a new uphill facility where people could more conveniently purchase food and drink.

"Most notably, this project sponsored the trailer that sat along the east side of the library last spring. As the uphill eatery project moved forward and the library café project emerged within our strategic plan, the simple conclusion was to solve both needs with a single facility located within the library sooner rather than later. An uphill eatery has always been a BSG project, and last year the Bison Express was a great step forward as this food trailer parked outside the library was very popular with students walking to class and studying to grab something to eat without walking downhill," Timer said. "Based on that success, Dining Services actually ordered a bigger truck but that has not been able to be connected to the proper utilities this year. While that has been a frustrating issue for BSG, the recent construction with the permanent uphill eatery is great."

The library does not expect to change any of the food and drink policies due to the new café, but all drinks sold will be in containers with closed lids.

"[The library] already relaxed food and drink guidelines more than a decade ago. We simply ask that drinks are covered and that food is limited to less messy items. You'll be able to take your food and drinks just about anywhere in the library. But, you'll also be expected to clean up after yourselves. The custodians who maintain the building so well are very busy and don't need additional messes throughout the building," Spencer said.

Before spring break, the area in the library was cleared to install the facility and a local vendor delivered a prototype café front for review.

"We quickly learned a lot from the community about what was and wasn't appropriate there, and we're currently working with the vendor to create something that more closely fits the library atmosphere. We are delighted with the plans that have emerged," Spencer said. "Over the course of the next few weeks, the café front will be delivered and the necessary utilities will be installed. We cleared the area in which the café service counter is to be installed."

The exact hours of operation are still in discussion, but the café will be open during periods of high usage.

"The hours of operation are also under consideration. Dining Services will staff the facility and expect it to be self-sustaining. Thus its hours of operation will be limited to times of expected high use," Spencer said.

Dining Services and ISR worked together to collaborate on the ideas.

"The folks from Dining Services and ISR all see how the success of the café depends on each other. Collaboration is easy once we define what we each need to be successful. From ISR's standpoint, we need to make sure that the food and drinks offered don't create unnecessary noise, fumes and messes," Spencer said.

For the past five years, ISR has discussed the possibility of adding a café to the library. Many academic libraries nationwide have installed such a facility for a variety of reasons.

"The University's library serves as a place to store and use a wealth of information resources. More importantly, it also serves as a wonderful place where people come to explore, learn, work together, meet with our expert staff and engage in a variety of intellectual pursuits," Spencer said. "We believe that the café will add to the comfortable and welcoming atmosphere that currently exists in the library. The more people want to use the building, the more valuable it is to the community."

"Would a trailer on the edge of the academic quad really fit into the beauty of this campus? I'd rather have the facility within the library where it can add to the comfort of using our services and also keep the quad pristine."

Library café caters to student needs

Thanks to the persistent efforts of the members of Bucknell Student Government, the "Bison Express" has been reincarnated as a café that will open in the library later this semester.

During the spring 2002 semester, the "Bison Express" food stand was conveniently located outside on the east side of the library, enabling students to quickly purchase anything from coffee and bagels to soda and hot dogs on their way to classes uphill.

After nearly a year of petitioning to get this service back, student pleas have been answered with the announcement of the new library café.

But doesn't the necessity of entering another building in order to purchase a quick snack before class defeat the whole purpose of "express?"

The new café undoubtedly will be a welcomed addition to the library. Previously, students needed to have cash on them if they were thirsty in the middle of a late-night studying session, or if they had a craving for the instant coffee available in the 24-hour lab.

Now students supposedly will be able to purchase 7th Street Café-quality beverages and snacks.

Still, anyone who has ever been to a café knows that the McDonald's drive-thru "breakfast in a minute" promise does not apply. It will be great not to have to make sure all the powder is dissolved before you drink your hot chocolate, but this is only assuming you haven't spilled it while sprinting into class late after standing in line for 15 minutes at the café.

During peak student hours—throughout the morning and through the lunch hour—the café should alleviate excessive waiting by limiting its menu to strictly prepackaged items and simple beverages.

Once the hustle of the class day is over, drinks and food that require more time-consuming preparation would be appropriate.

Making sure the café is adequately staffed is also imperative in making sure that it operates efficiently. One worker will likely not be able to handle the rush that ensues for a cup of coffee 10 minutes before each morning class begins.

The café also must be cautious that it does not affect the atmosphere of the library. Quiet talk around the café is certainly expected, but a shrieking cappuccino machine, a spinning blender and a constantly-beeping microwave will be nothing short of distracting for students trying to work on the main level of the library or for the Information Services and Resources workers who will have to endure the sounds all day.

Increasing the availability of food and drinks in the library may also result in spills that damage library materials. If this becomes a frequent occurence, a "food only" space may need to be necessary to ensure that use of necessary library materials is not limited by equipment damages.

As long as the planners of the new café keep in mind the initial mission of the "Bison Express"—to provide students with quick snacks and beverages because a trip to the Langone Center was inconvenient—and the importance of maintaining the atmosphere of the library, the café should be able to effectively serve both students on the go and students enjoying a study break.

Catalyst editorial decisions questioned

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

We're all young people, relatively unprofessional in the literal sense of the word. We've never been on salary with The New York Times or Business Week. But we're generally smart; we're thoughtful; we just want to put our ideas out there. Oh, and sometimes we're careless.

It takes a lot of work to produce a student publication, and a lot of thought to create an effective one. Among the most difficult parts of this process can be, problematically, to use our best discretion at all times in spite of all the slick one-liners and witty ripostes we use daily to shut our friends up or get a rise out of our parents. I've been on editorial boards that have made both good and bad decisions in this regard. True to experience, sometimes it's just too hard to hold back. I'm giving The Catalyst the benefit of the doubt and assuming that its collaborators actually faced a dilemma and considered the possibility of some of its content being counterproductive to its message, but decided to print it anyway. Because I always appreciate everyone's critiques of my writing and publications (broad smile), I would never sell The Catalyst short of its own due process.

"Blowjobs for Bush" is a catchy title and might make for an interesting satire except for one minor technicality: The course of U.S. foreign policy history has suggested quite the opposite of Courtney Spohn-Larkins' premise that our Commander-in-Chief might be less likely to wage war in Iraq were he able to mix it up a little in the bedroom ... or ... Oval Office. Ironically, ill-advised oral intercourse (it's not sex, remember?) has in fact led directly to war with Iraq in the past. In 1998, America faced a similar standoff with Iraq and the Hussein regime's unwillingness to cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors. When then U.S. President Bill Clinton (the same president mentioned in Spohn-Larkins' article who supposedly "did not seek the disarmament of Iraq") finally decided to part ways with the United Nations and begin an almost-unilateral effort to bomb Iraq back to the Stone Age (naturally, Britain was on our side), more bombs were dropped over a period of three days than were dropped during the entire Gulf War.

When outspoken critics questioned Clinton's motives for leading a—how do they say it—"pre-emptive war" against Iraq, a modestly popular explanation was that Clinton was pushing for war as a politically strategic move to distract the world (and maybe his wife, too) from his embarrassing sex scandals. As history suggests, the U.S. military actually tends to see more action when our president ... sees more action.

Spohn-Larkins said, "If it came down to the choice between a white man who has indiscrete sex or a white man who would rather kill everyone he disagrees with, give me the man who would rather stick his penis than his military in others' faces!" In light of new information, if it came down to a man who has "indiscrete" sex and attempts to cover it up by bombing the sand out of Iraq versus a man who has gone through great lengths to give the world asexual reasons for war, whom would you chose?

> This attempt to compare the most widely viewed cable news channel in the country to an agent of Hitler and the Nazis is tasteless and counterproductive.

In addition to the tiny oversight of the thrashing of Iraq in 1998 under Clinton (who arguably could have given former U.S. President John F. Kennedy a run for his money as the leading Democrat when it came to extracurricular activities), a much-needed and appreciated attempt to bring feminism more into the mainstream of University discourse was slightly tainted by Laura Kamienski's dogmatic assessment of feminist thought. Tearing down the existing patriarchal barriers is going to require males, conservatives, pro-lifers and even Christians! It's going to require moral assessment in addition to "practical reasoning. Just like every other civil rights cause, it's going to require coalitions and bridges over ideological gaps. If feminism had to be defined as Kamienski defines it in her article, she might be the only true feminist on the face of the planet. Why? Because she has given her own "personal" definition of feminism in the same fashion as do those who she criticizes, and chances are the rest of us have our own different definitions. If there is to be a loose definition of feminism, as is called for in Kamienski's article, shouldn't it be one that doesn't alienate such a substantial portion of women as might her definition?

I genuinely applaud The Catalyst for bringing more feminist perspectives to the fore. Though everyone should have a forum for his or her views, regardless of how moderate or extreme, Kamienski's article seems to be in effect detrimental to the goal of separating stigma from feminism.

And, at last, the Grand Finale: A picture on the back cover of The Catalyst that explicitly refers to the Fox News Channel as "The Official News Channel of The Homeland"—in German, alluding blatantly to the Nazi regime. Written on the picture: "Ein Volk" (one people). "Ein Reich" (one empire). "Ein Fuhrer" (one leader). "Ein News Channel" (self-explanatory).

This attempt to compare the most widely viewed cable news channel in the country to an agent of Hitler and the Nazis is tasteless and counterproductive. Granted, it's just a propaganda poster. But there are millions of families throughout the world who have members who were brutally killed by the Nazis. I would venture to say that most don't take the atrocities committed by the Nazis as lightly as they might a conservative-leaning news channel—the only conservative-leaning news channel among a multitude of news media—with which they might not always agree. In fact, it's about time we stop underhandedly associating conservatism with Nazism altogether. There is no factual basis for such an association; it's just not funny to even jokingly draw a connection between a mainstream party in a legitimate two-party system and the murderous, jingoistic Nazis. Newsflash: Genocide isn't funny. Even CNN will tell you that. Indeed, if holocaust denial advertisements are tasteless and inappropriate, an advertisement that likens America's most popular news channel to an agent of genocide is disturbing to say the least.

Modifying some or all of these things might help The Catalyst reach out to more people who do care strongly about the issues that it raises. I mean, other than that, it was pretty good, I guess.

Bush's education access plan reduces opportunity

By Gerald Funderburg
Writer

As I sit here and ponder the topic of affirmative action, the question of what is so controversial about this topic pops into my head. Why now in our country is the current administration trying to get rid of this policy, or in his words, modify what was put in place to better those who were for centuries battered by a physical, psychological and civil abuse. Civil Rights activist like W.E.B. Dubois, Marcus Garvey, Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr. would have struggled for nothing if we take seriousthe words of our president seriously. The topic of affirmative action and its future in this country will either set us back four decades or continue to improve the functioning of this country.

U.S. President George W. Bush, when running for office in 2000, relayed the message to the American people that education would be his main concern if he was elected. This was evident for the past two years with Bush allocating money to many educational programs. But now the true light is being seen. Yes, Bush stated that he would improve education, but he did not state for whom this improvement would be made. Ralph Neas of "People For the American Way," plainly said, "This decision indicates that President Bush's commitment to his right-wing political base outweighs his professed commitment to educational opportunity."

Bush's decision to back the white students at the University of Michigan clearly positions him on the side of those who see little wrong with returning to an educated elite that is predominantly white, and male. It's important to remember that affirmative action has assisted women more than minorities. So if affirmative action is abolished by the Supreme Court, it will not only push public schools towards the norm of private schools, which are white-dominated, but it will transform our country back to the "patriarchal times of Moses."

Since its founding well before 1776, this country's goods and services primarily benefited European peoples. Following this history, all the way up to the civil rights movement, an affirmative action policy called racism was in place for white people. This type of affirmative action disenfranchised anyone of color and women. When this was happening many white people did not have a problem with it. Now, a quarter of a century has passed since the decision on the University of California v. Bakke affirmative action case and now it (the Bush administration) wants to get rid of it. We (minorities and women) finally have obtained a piece of the American pie—"a land of opportunity"—and we have to give it back as if we did not earn it. Minorities and women are beginning to enjoy some of the prosperity that was enjoyed by white males in this country for centuries.

So what is so wrong about affirmative action now? Bush said that it is unconstitutional to use color as the only factor for admissions to a college or university. I agree with that. But universities and colleges do not do that. Jeffrey Lehman, dean of the University of Michigan Law School and Cornell University's president-elect said, "We regularly admit white applicants who have lower grades and test scores than some minority applicants whom we reject. Sometimes a white candidate would have a stronger file than a minority candidate in an area other than grades and test scores, in areas such as public service and leadership and under our policy that could make the difference between who gets in and who does not regardless of the candidate's race."

You can see schools that have historically been white-populated have long considered the issue of diversity. This is the only way that we will become diverse. Looking at grades solely would be detrimental to the increasing diversity of the workforce. Business like 3M, Fourti, Boeing and Steele Case recognize the fact that if affirmative action is abolished, the diversity in higher education will decrease, and this will decrease the diversity in the work force. These firms also understand that they need qualified minorities as employees in order to reach that section of the American population when they seek consumers and clients. When the black population alone is responsible for $3 billion, companies obviously want a portion of that.

Bush's Affirmative Access Plan states that the top 10 percent of a graduating class gets automatic admissions to a university or college. The aim of the Affirmative Access Plan is to increase minority participation without relying on racial or other supposedly suspect criteria. According to one interpretation of Bush's plan, as indicated by Michael C. Dorf, "Affirmative access thus seems to hold out promise as a colorblind alternative to affirmative action—one that will achieve the same end, while employing less controversial means" (http://writ.new.findlaw.com/dorf/20010101.html). Is this the case? This plan derives itself from the 1996, of Hopwood v. Texas case. This case ruled that the Bakke case had no precedent. The court barred the University of Texas Law School, all public universities in Texas and the other states that comprise the Fifth Circuit, from giving any preference to racial minorities in admissions. With this ruling, other states like California and Florida are doing the same. But does this plan really work, or does it have major faults?

First, the plan will distort college admissions priorities. This 10 percent rule will not allow schools like Cornell and the University of Michigan to consider those applicants who they deem to be the best qualified or most deserving students. By only looking at grades, you can not take sufficient consideration of the difficulty of courses, admission essays, standardized test scores, extracurricular activities, obstacles overcome and the overall competitiveness of the school from which particular applicants come. Clearly, you cannot factor in race, ethnicity, gender or class.

Furthermore, what about the "Legacy Clause." Bush, who was a C student in high school, was admitted to Yale University, a prestigious, competitive Ivy League school, based on the fact that his grandfather and father attended Yale. What do you call this?

The second problem is that the Affirmative Access Plan depends on segregation. For an example, if you admitted the "top 10 percent of Texas high school graduates, this would mean that you were admitting a substantial number of African-American and Hispanic students—but this is an artifact of de facto segregation" (Dorf, Find Law's Legal commentary). Since there is a gap between the test scores and grades of white and minority students, integration would threaten the 10 percent plan: At least in the short run, as more schools become integrated, more minority students are going to fall out of the affirmative access criteria of the top 10 percent.

Minority parents will have to make a decision on if they want their kids to attend majority white schools with better qualified teachers and resources to increase their scores or stay in a school where they are guaranteed to be in the top 10 percent. This Affirmative Access Plan is only going to increase the gap between minority test scores and whites, the test scores of middle-class students.

Abolishing affirmative action will have far greater negative impact on this cou ntry that is immediately apparent. That is the problem now. Bush and his Cabinet are not extending their vision beyond the immediate. They are not addressing the confounding or lurking variables of their affirmative access plan. Their plan will not improve education opportunity. Their plan will not increase work force diversity. Finally, their plan will knock America back into a social configuration that is likely to seem a lot like the post-Civil War failed Reconstruction period like the post-Civil War, failed Reconstruction period.

"Coalition" needs expanding to rebuild Iraq

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

As this article is being written the "blitzkrieg" or "shock and awe" bombing of Baghdad is underway by the U.S. military. Whatever your preference of adjectives to describe this military operation or your opinion of it, the United States has alienated millions of people to reach this point. Our country will need those same millions to win the peace. The countries that we have lending support to this cause do not include most of the major nations of the world.

In a lame effort to obfuscate the facts, White House spokesman Ari Fleisher claimed that the entire population, and not just the governments, of the 30-40 countries in our coalition support the Iraqi war. In reality, the United States and Britain essentially are the "the coalition of the willing." Fleisher said, "Over 1 billion people from these countries support our war plans." That is some real creative geography combined with selectively skewed demographics on his part. The economic giants of Romania, Bulgaria, Colombia and Nicaragua will not pay for much or lend any troops to this operation. Troops are only coming from the United States and Great Britain, with several thousand from Australia and the United States paying for the bulk of the operation and subsequent Iraqi occupation.

> That is some real creative geography combined with selectively skewed demographics on his part. The economic giants of Romania, Bulgaria, Colombia and Nicaragua will not pay for much or lend any troops to this operation.

Nicaragua backs our operation. This is no surprise since our government spent hundreds of dollars per vote in their last election to elect the candidate U.S. representatives supported. Russia, China, France and Germany are only the most well-known countries that we have alienated. Canada, Mexico and Chile didn't sign on with the United States either, and they are close economic trading partners in our own hemisphere. Chile, especially, has a lot to lose in opposing our war initiative. According to The New York Times, it has a trade agreement that must be ratified by the U.S. Senate as early as May. According to Marcela Sanchez in The Washington Post, "Chile proudly proposed an alternate plan to the United States proposal at the U.N. Chile described their move as a matter of conscience concerning the Iraq matter." Will our Republican-controlled Senate punish Chile's independence at the United Nations in May? Stay tuned.

In fact, U.S. post-Saddam plans for Iraq will be so expensive and time sensitive that we will need all the international goodwill we can muster, especially from the United Nations. The expertise of the United Nations in the areas of disaster relief and refugee aid will be necessary if our extended occupation of Iraq will ever be successful. It would be helpful if our government representatives (President George W. Bush, Secretary of State Colin Powell, etc.) stop portraying the United Nations as a weakened or ineffective organization simply because the United Nations fails to vote in the U.S. interests on occasion. This simply shows frustration from the last world superpower that has a powerful political position on the U.N. Security Council, including veto power in the resolution process. The United States must address the tone it uses in relations with other nations because of our concentration of political and military power in the world. Our leaders must use discretion to proclaim pride in our country but not look simply, blatantly, arrogant in relations with other countries. Whatever our true motives in Iraq, it looks like an oil grab for many in the world.

One example of a failure of diplomacy and clarity in advertising our motives to the world is illustrated in the Australian newspaper The Age. The paper mentions the Bush State of the Union Address passage concerning AIDS. According to the public affairs nonprofit group Public Campaign, the surprising AIDS proposal was a payback to the heavy Republican campaign contributors of the U.S. pharmaceutical industry. The Age reported, "The Bush Administration in May 2002 at the United Nations Children's Summit opposed the use of condoms for the preventions of HIV/AIDS. In July, Bush withheld $34 million from the United Nations Population Fund for maternal and childcare, and birth control, and HIV/AIDS control. In August, Bush withheld $200 million in funding to support women and tackle HIV/AIDS in Afghanistan. In January 2003, the United States killed a deal in which 143 World Trade Organization members agreed to allow developing countries to import generic drugs to fight AIDS, instead of the more expensive drugs from Europe and the United States."

Was the $15 billion Bush AIDS relief program for Africa a market niche subsidy for the American pharmaceutical industry for entry into the African market? Regardless of our country's motives, it looks that way to any informed observer. In this instance the United States looks religiously and economically motivated on a major international health issue affecting the life and death decisions of millions in Third World countries. The United States looks to the world like it prefers profits over people on this issue.

Our global markets and international relationships are valuable to the United States, but our country must not appear to primarily about profit or domination. Simply appearing financially motivated illustrates a pattern of concentrated power by the United States to the rest of the world and breeds contempt, suspicion and, worst of all, humiliation to many in the world. Have we begun to recruit legions of followers to the cause of those that attacked us on 9/11? Before we slap ourselves on the back and congratulate our military for defeating a foe that has a $1.3 billion defense budget—compared to our $300-350 billion defense department budget—we must maintain our patriotic perspective while praising our soldiers for their service.

I fear that our actions in Iraq will only further alienate our traditional allies and further estrange our country from those that already mistrust our motives. Appearances are important in international relations, and we appear to give little regard to the views and opinions of allies and enemies alike. In a global trade environment this is shortsighted and will hurt the United States for years to come. This is no way to gather allies to win the peace in Iraq ... or anywhere else. "Shock and awe" may turn out to be a poor tool of diplomacy sooner rather than later to our great regret as we try to win the peace.

Reliance on written word overlooks verbal skills

By Aaron Bates
Writer

With graduation quickly approaching, I realize that there is a major flaw in our liberal arts education. This problem is related to the issue of the W1s and W2s of which we are all so aware. The University places a great deal of stress on these courses, and they are well intentioned, as written communication is deemed invaluable. It is important to be articulate in the written work that we will dispense over the next 20 (if we are lucky) to 50 years of our lives. An issue that seems to be ignored is the need for articulation of thoughts when we speak. We are not in a paper society. It is impossible for us to live our lives without speaking up, without voicing our opinions in a clear manner.

Many would argue that not all students that attend the University are in need of such a requirement. People often view public speaking as a skill that is taught in grade school, so it is not necessary to teach it beyond that level. This statement is contradictory because writing is also a skill that is taught in grade school. By that logic, both of these skills should be up to par by the time students graduate high school, and both should be unnecessary requirements for the University to have.

Yet, it is apparent that some students are in dire need of speech and spoken language training. At meetings in the past, I have noted Bucknellians who seem to have no skills in verbalizing their thoughts. Certainly, they had the skills necessary to gain acceptance to the University. This is not always the case. There are students who will enter and exit this fine institution without learning how to speak to others; a frightening fact when you look at the large number of CEOs and community leaders that the University produces. Many students can express their deepest thoughts through schematics and numbers, but if asked to verbalize the same statements, they would be left flabbergasted.

In my collegiate career, I have only had a few opportunities with which to engage other students in my class with spoken presentations. What strikes me as embarrassing is that I searched for a straight speech and rhetoric class during my sophomore and junior years, frustrated to find that there was no course that provided this basic skills training. I have since given up on finding classes in the art of oral communication, and have settled into the thought that this is one of many aspects that my education at the University will never afford me. I can go on with the knowledge that until things change, the University will be releasing unprepared graduates into the workforce.

Without verbal communication skills, our education means nothing. Since it is not possible to communicate solely through written means, I encourage students to demand that speech be introduced into the curriculum. Adding an S1 or an S2 will add to the requirements, but as liberal art schools are supposed to do, it will prepare us for the world of work, where both written and verbal communication are necessary.

Middle East conflict needs attention and action

I am trying really, really hard not to watch the news these days—the war coverage is beginning to look like a sequel to a deranged action flick, and I really don't like action flicks. The economy is continuing its downward spiral, and if I hear about another kidnapped child or brutal murder (the illegal kind), I may be forced into a dismal state of disillusionment. Nevertheless, I have more than once given in to some sick and masochistic desire to torture myself with bad news, hypocrisy and blatant stupidity. By the way, if you want a large dose of the above, just go to www.foxnews.com. But there was one story that I read that I cannot forget and feel impelled to comment on.

In case you haven't heard, a 23-year old American protester, Rachel Corrie, was killed last week by an Israeli bulldozer while peacefully protesting Israel's destruction of Palestinian houses. My first thoughts were: How horribly tragic, but accidents do happen and I'm sure Israel is horrified by this event. But then I read the details, and heard Israel's statement, which basically said, yeah, we're sorry, but she shouldn't have been in a Palestinian refugee camp in the first place. They accused her of behaving irresponsibly, although they did promise to investigate her death.

OK, stop for one moment. She shouldn't have been in a Palestinian refugee camp, helping a marginalized people through peaceful means (read: She did not strap a bomb to her body and hop on a bus)? Moreover, I was shocked by the pictures I saw that were actually taken before and after she was run over—twice. She is wearing bright orange and waving frantically at the Israeli soldier driving the bulldozer—in the next picture she is just a heap on the ground. Now I've never driven a bulldozer, so correct me if I am wrong, but can't you see what you are doing from up there? And not to be graphic, but wouldn't you feel a body under the wheels so you know not to run over the area a second time?

Which leads me to this horrifying conclusion: The Israeli soldier purposely ran over that woman, perhaps in blind anger and frustration. I am not blaming Israel for one man's actions, but I cannot believe that they would not apologize profusely as a result of what happened. Actually, I am not all that surprised. The Israeli government continually ignores human rights when the Palestinians are concerned and has turned a blind eye to a desperate people—a bitter irony considering the plight of the Jews (persecution, dispersal around the globe, the Holocaust...). They continue to violate international law, but hey, so does the United States. If the United States continues to support Israel as myopically as it does now, we must be prepared for more terrorist backlashes from the Arab and Muslim world—because they feel desperate and victimized, and they feel the need to unite against a power that seems unjust. The power is unjust, undoubtedly so—and the violence seems interminable.

Yet I feel certain that most Israeli's and most Palestinian people are peaceful people, and those that do resort to terrorism (and I purport that both groups do) are members of an extremist, vindictive minority. But it is these extremists on both sides—Hamas, Hezbollah, Sharon's government) that are keeping the region in turmoil, because neither side will stop until they see the other side running for the hills or liquidated. Human nature appears as such that neither side is able to see past its own miseries and injustices to realize that the other group has suffered, albeit differently, strife.

As for Rachel Corrie, I believe that the United States ought to receive not only a real apology for the incident, but a thorough and fair investigation ought to be conducted. While this isn't very likely—the Bush Administration is too wrapped up in preparing the Eve of Destruction, it must be done. And as for peaceful protesting? I sincerely hope that this incident doesn't discourage anyone from doing so. I recently told a friend that I didn't see the need to protest (the war in particular) because it seems like no one is listening and the government is going to do what it's going to do, regardless of my opinions. I was wrong, of course—we must continue protesting this unjust world—it is in fact, our only salvation. We must do it for the American people, and for all people. They may look, and never see, a corrupted power, but at least we can say that we resisted the ugliness, hatred and violence—and that must be enough for now.

The Dining Services campus monopoly

Currently, the minimum declining balance is $525. Some students find that this is an outlandish amount and end up buying $200 worth of Oreos from the C-Store as the semester winds down. Others bemoan their lack of cash for food and spend weekends coming up with new ways to sucker their parents into paying for incremental $50 declining addendums. Too much or too little, $525 is rarely just right without some tweaking. I fall into the former category, yet cannot help but be righteously indignant when I invariably get the question, "Cheeseburger?"

I stand in line at the Bison grill counter and watch as healthy people laden their sandwiches down with various vegetables and sauces. After that half-hour ordeal, "A cheeseburger, please," I implore. Depending on how bored the Bison worker and how busy the grill, I can have my burger in a matter of minutes.

> Overpricing is an appreciated practice as I try to get rid of my $200 at the end of the semester without packing my car with more calories than clothes. Nonetheless, it is mildly offensive to realize that the C in C-Store is for costly, not convenient.

At the checkout, I get the cheese question. My slice of cheese—and Bison workers give you only one slice unless you specifically ask for more—costs me extra. The pragmatist in me calculates that after hundreds of burgers plus cheese, I will have taken care of my semesterly surplus. Yet somehow I don't think that will be enough to conquer my excess declining. Nor is it a question of stinginess; I do not begrudge paying the due cost of my sandwich. My resentment does not stem wholly from the price. Some things cost more than others—the econ major in me screams of supply and demand, though I am fairly certain that there is a slice of American to go around for the endless number of condiments and veggies that scrape by without cost.

There is no denying that some campus-provided food is pricey. The C-Store charges almost 40 percent more for Oreos than Weis Markets. Overpricing is an appreciated practice as I try to get rid of my $200 at the end of the semester without packing my car with more calories than clothes. Nonetheless, it is mildly offensive to realize that the C in C-Store is for costly, not convenient. Dining Services has to make money, but so does everywhere else that sells Oreos for less while still garnering a profit. I can only wonder if their inflated prices are driven by greed, lack of competition, gross inefficiency or simply the failure of the University to properly control its vendor. It is just one of life's mysteries, I guess.

Certainly people cheat the system. We have all seen people nibble a crouton in line or sip their sodas then refill, and that is probably the tip of the pilfering iceberg. When the Bison overprices more for the same food every year, I am inclined to say, have another crouton. Such consumption without compensation is commonplace and some people will continue undeterred. Perhaps the "stealing" will subside somewhat if students do not feel that Dining Services is taking advantage of its relative market exclusivity on campus food.

That is the crux of the issue: Many students have few other choices for their everyday food supply, especially since campus meal plans are mandatory. The Langone Center eateries are it for them. These are the places where we regularly purchase sustenance, and it seems obnoxious that Dining Services gets away with charging us more simply because it can.

In fact, students paid more than $33,500 in tuition this school year for the pleasure of overpriced food. So I will look the other way when people munch vegetables off their salads, and I will watch unconcerned as people sip while they wait and then refill. I will even continue to begrudgingly admit I have cheese on that. What irks me is that I will do all of these things because I have no other reasonable choice as a slave of sorts to the monopoly that is Dining Services.

Not a sober hour during House Party

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

It's that time of year again—the sunlight rekindles the leapingly green spirit of the grass, the clouds dream in the blue sky and flowers burst into spontaneous affirmations that a single ray of splendor rivals all the utility of the world.

Yeah, the strategically positioned flowers at the University are not exactly wild or spontaneous. Appropriately, the passion and fervor of the students, which has only come to ripen now, erupt only into an orgiastic display of ritual inauthenticity—House Party, the annual University-wide binge-drinking contest.

House Party is a truly unique phenomenon. It offers students the yearly and otherwise unavailable opportunity to "wet the whistle" a little bit, to "liquor up," to "fill up on liquor-courage" and have a fun time—and all without the pressure of remembering any of it!

Sure, the bands are great. You can hear them all through Lewisburg and two miles away in Montandon. I love music; it's one of my passions, but I think the best thing about the House Party bands is that they mute the unremitting chatter of ambulances, drunken yelling contests and shattering glass.

And if House Party is a truly unique phenomenon, how exactly does it represent a departure from the conventions of every other weekend at the University?

As my friend the philosophy major described it, House Party is "The Festival of 'Das Man,'" the culmination of individual values hinging on average-ness, numbness and Heideggarian "chatter"—a flight from one's self, all the words and actions and rituals without the depth of meaning.

The scene is absolutely surreal—or perhaps it would be more appropriate to call it absurd. Empty beer cans and trampled, used plastic cups appear on the lawns as if they had magically sprung from the dirt after the rain. The sidewalks are permanently stained with the odor and residue of clumsily spilled beer, and the trash cans overflow with an inordinate mass of casings.

> If the beer supply to Lewisburg were to be severed on this weekend occasion, hide the rubbing alcohol. Hide the hairspray.

For one shining moment of the academic year, students fail to remain apathetic about something—but what emerges out of this is a single-minded obsession and definitive goal: getting absolutely tanked.

Alcohol can be an anesthesia to a greater reality for some students; its sway is certainly not due to some ineffable power to ignite and free the mystical faculties of human nature, because people are always crushed to earth by the cold and dry facts of the sober hour.

So why perpetuate the only acceptable lifestyle at the University? It is sanctioned and made official by the University; you are tagged like a zoo animal with identical House Party wristbands.

Nothing about this festive weekend drives the individual up and far above the average, over the depths of the herd mentality and into the cultivation of true individuality. This festive weekend is an absolutely disgusting display of absurdity, and perhaps it is only so to those who choose not to participate.

So what to do? Well, perhaps it is best to save your energy for cleaning up after that drunken prankster who decided it was more than absolutely hilarious to dump the contents of a trash can all over your yard. Perhaps while others are starting their pregaming for the orgy, two days early, you should bolt down anything to which you might assign any value. Close your ears to the mess, not the music, or prevent a friend from going comatose from alcohol poisoning.

Or maybe you go and do something you have not done before—and enjoy it.

One thing is for sure: If the beer supply to Lewisburg were to be severed on this weekend occasion, hide the rubbing alcohol. Hide the hairspray. Hide even the methanol-containing Aqua Velva, because desperation would be followed by rioting! As it turns out on this campus, I guess, beer is the opiate of the masses.

Greeks buy T-shirts from Nicaraguan co-op

A Nicaraguan woman works on one of this year's Greek Week T-shirts. The University's Greek Week Committee chose to purchase T-shirts, which Bucknell Brigade brought back after spring break, from the Nicaraguan co-op.

Reinforcing the idea that our everyday decisions can have a positive impact on the world, affecting more than just ourselves, this year's Greek students are wearing Greek Week T-shirts purchased in support of a worker-owned sewing cooperative. The purchase of the T-shirts was made possible for the students through the cooperation of members of the Bucknell Brigade and the Greek Week Committee.

This year's Greek Week Committee, composed of one representative from each campus fraternity and sorority, agreed to purchase the shirts from the Nicaraguan cooperative at the suggestion of Kristin Hughes '04, the Kappa Kappa Gamma Sorority representative to the committee and a participant in the January 2003 Bucknell Brigade. Students who traveled to Nicaragua with the Bucknell Brigade heard the incredible story of the women who work in the sewing cooperative, and clearly many wanted to spread their story of perseverance even after returning to the United States.

"Everyone on the committee was very supportive of the idea, even though most people had never been to Nicaragua with the Bucknell Brigade," Hughes said.

The order of 1,121 shirts, each bearing a design by Delta Gamma sorority sister Deanna Schnepp '04 and the slogan "Built to last," was placed early in the spring semester, facilitated largely by members of the Bucknell Brigade, including Director of Service Learning Janice Butler, Assistant Professor of Women's Studies and Anthropology Coralyn Davis, Katie Kohn '03 and Ben Colby '03. Members of the Brigade, many of whom helped construct the co-op's production facility during past delegations to Nicaragua, have been encouraging continued support of the cooperative by campus organizations. A previous donation made by the Residential Colleges allowed for the purchase of silk-screening equipment that the women use in their production.

The women who sewed the shirts, owners of a female sewing cooperative in Cuidad Sandino, Nicaragua, are dependent on consistent clothing orders to keep their self-made business running. Because the cooperative is conducted under fair labor conditions, the products cost more to manufacture than similar versions that are mass-produced in sweatshops. The women of the cooperative are constantly competing with sweatshops and often experience periods of little or no work.

Maggie's Organics, a clothing company based in Michigan, is now one of the cooperative's regular customers, purchasing and selling other products that include nightshirts, camisoles and hair scrunchies. Early 2002 found the women with a lack of orders, struggling to keep their endeavor alive despite having already overcome tremendous odds in financing and constructing the cooperative on their own.

In need of funds to keep their business from falling apart, the women of the cooperative tried to borrow money to invest in cloth for their work. According to the Center for Development in Central America, which helped the women build the cooperative following Hurricane Mitch, the World Bank denied a request for a loan made by the women, claiming that the project was too small. Local banks, which the women also turned to, could only offer a loan at 20 percent interest.

The Greek Week Committee's order was brought back to the United States by a delegation of the Bucknell Brigade that traveled to Nicaragua during spring break. As a result, the shipping costs were offset enough that approximately 40 cents from the sale of each T-shirt was donated to the Bucknell Brigade to continue the construction of its women's clinic in Nueva Vida, Nicaragua. Each of the T-shirts cost $8, which some students pay individually, though most sororities and fraternities cover the expense out of their funds. Although the shirts were more expensive than the usual $4-5 rate, the committee is confident that the decision was worthwhile.

"If given the choice between profit and nonprofit, we feel that it is important to utilize the charities as much as possible. I would definitely encourage others to use their funds in this way in the future," said Meredith Atkinson '04, vice president of the Panhellenic Council.

The T-shirts are an example of charitable acts by Greeks.

"Fraternities and sororities are based on philanthropy, and being able to do this goes along perfectly with that theme," Hughes said.

The Greek Week Committee was satisfied with the quality and design of the T-shirts and hopes to support the women's sewing cooperative further by continuing their association. The choice that the committee made, seemingly insignificant, was instrumental to working as a campus to support fair trade and denounce sweatshop labor. Members of the Bucknell Brigade hope that other campus organizations will take similar steps to support the sewing cooperative.

"We're hoping that we can continue to find ways to promote their success. By supporting the co-op with future orders, Bucknellians can show these women from far away that we are concerned about their welfare and are committed to their survival," Bucknell Brigade Steering Committee member Ben Colby '03 said.

Students who wear Greek Week T-shirts this year, possibly unaware of the story behind their garments, should be aware that they are making a difference in the lives of these Nicaraguan women without ever leaving campus.

Fremont Scholars strive for a more worldly perspective

By Ashley Maliken

Recently a number of the University's international students traveled to Harrisburg in order to learn more about how the government is run, tour the capital and meet state Republican representative Merle Phillips. These four first-year students, Giang Hoang of Malaysia, Zubin Mehta of India, Jhana Saunders of Jamaica and Yew San Lim of Vietnam, are recipients of the Fremont Scholarship.

This scholarship, given by Michael Fremont in memory of his wife Lillian, has provided need-based financial aid to international students since 1991.

They were accompanied by Matt Firm '05, Richard Haislip '04 and employees of the Small Business Development Center: Director Jon Vernam, Assistant Director of Technical Consulting Mike Dorkoski, Business Analyst Anthony Kidd and Secretary Shelley Gadoury.

The Fremont scholars were flooded with the clamor of the capital and had a photo shoot with Phillips, all the while gaining valuable knowledge about the logistics of American government.

In addition to tours and meetings, the students also had the opportunity to visit the Department of Community and Economic Development, enabling them to hear about opportunities for international students and graduates to support international trade.

Though many of the students had experienced "Americanized" education in their home countries, learning about America in the place where its government runs is an opportunity many thought they would never have.

This Harrisburg trip was offered as part of the monthly intercultural experience Fremont Scholars are required to participate in because of the financial aid they receive.

Other activities the Fremont Scholars participate in include a tour of the 7th Street House during Black History Month and a visit to the Greek Carnival to get a feel for Greek life at the University. Susan Zingale-Baird, director of International Student Services, coordinates all the events for the students and also gets them involved on campus.

Each Fremont Scholar is required to dedicate eight hours each week "promoting international understanding" as a form of his or her stipend work study.

Each Fremont Scholar is required to put in eight hours a week "promoting international understanding" as a form of stipend work study, with placements throughout the University....Also, at the end of their first year, all Fremont Scholars join together and work on one, culminating spring project. This endeavor gives them a larger opportunity to promote international awareness as a group, and has proved to be a wonderful success in the past.

This work continues for the duration of their enrollment at the University. Students work at the Admissions Office, the Career Development Center, Campus Activities and Programs and the Craft Center, where a cooking class with international zest is currently in the planning stages.

Students are asked to keep a journal documenting their time and experiences at the University, allowing the International Office to gauge the effectiveness of its program, and also giving students the opportunity to reflect on all they are encountering.

Also, at the culmination of their first year, all Fremont Scholars join together and work together on one spring project. This endeavor gives them an opportunity to promote international awareness as a group, and has proved to be a success in the past.

"They're here to gain knowledge and access to technology, [in order to] bring it back to their home countries," Zingale-Baird said.

And what better way to do that then to promote involvement both on campus and in the surrounding areas?

Other contributions of the Fremont Scholars include frequent visits throughout the Lewisburg area to speak about their lives as international students.

This year the Cub Scouts have asked the Fremont Scholars to speak, and most are willing to share their experiences.

According to Zingale-Baird, without the generous donations of Michael Fremont the international population would not be nearly what it is today. The financial assistance the University is able to provide also increases the number of international students at the University.

"The world is definitely shrinking," Zingale-Baird said. "We've got to be committed to need-based aid [for international students] because everyone benefits from exposure to other cultures and countries."

In upcoming years the International Student Services Office hopes to keep their numbers high, as well as keep international students involved on campus and in the community.

Beginning with the first Fremont Scholar, Angela Angelova '97 of Bulgaria, this program has proved successful. The hope is that the future will bring just as much success.

Swinging the night away

Students gathered Friday night in Vedder Living Room to learn to how to swing dance. The Penn State Swing Club taught them how to "cut a rug," and after an hour-long lesson, students could "jump and jive" the night away. The "Spring Fling Dance Thing" was sponsored by the Residence Hall Association. All in all, it was a swinging time!

The Bleu Plate Café makes a great lunch

❖ Restaurant Review

Under a blue awning on Market Street is an often-missed treat of Lewisburg—the Blue Plate Café. It is an ideal place for casual dining at affordable prices.

Entering the café, I first saw the eclectic collection of different kitchen gadgets, spices, dishtowels, place mats, mugs, trays and other accessories. It was interesting to browse through these items while waiting for lunch.

The red and white checkered tabletops and blue booths create an inviting atmosphere. A black and white photograph complements each booth. There is also seating available outside for dining alfresco when the weather permits.

I got a menu and ordered at the counter in the back. The menu for lunch ranges from specialty sandwiches—including hamburgers and cheeseburgers served with potato chips—to different types of wraps—like gyros, served with fresh fruit—to salads and soups. Side dishes, such as their "fabulous fries" and macaroni and cheese, are also offered. Ice cream, milkshakes and floats are available for dessert.

My selection for lunch was a chicken Caesar wrap with fruit salad and a side order of their "fabulous fries"—I had to see if these fries were truly fabulous or just a flop. In just a little over five minutes, my meal was delivered to me, on a blue plate—good service considering that I was there during prime lunchtime and the restaurant was bustling with business.

The chicken Caesar wrap is made with chicken, romaine lettuce, a light amount of their egg-free Caesar dressing and croutons. The croutons added a refreshing contrast in texture to the wrap. The amount of dressing was perfect. The wrap was not drenched in dressing, nor was it completely dry. The fresh romaine lettuce was also nice and added a satisfying crunch factor to the wrap. Carrots and celery were served on the side to complement the wrap.

Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

The Bleu Plate Café is located on Market Street across from the Campus Theatre. The restaurant's atmosphere is casual, classy and affordable.

My fruit was delicious—the fruit salad was not too heavily melon-based. Instead, it consisted of pineapple, honeydew, grapes and strawberries. I was very pleased with the amount of pineapple in the salad.

The "fabulous fries" held true to their name. The seasoning on the fries gave them an extra kick of flavor. With some ketchup, they were quite possibly the best fries I have ever had. I would recommend them as a must-have item for any visit to the Bleu Plate Café.

On my visit, I saw members of the Lewisburg community, professors and students all enjoying lunch at this casual, yet classy restaurant. Its location across from the Campus Theatre makes it a prime location for dinner before the movies. Lunch was under $10—and that includes the wrap with fruit salad, fries and a drink.

My lunch at the Bleu Plate Café was a success. The environment was conducive for me to enjoy my meal in both a comfortable and timely manner.

The Bleu Plate Café is open for lunch from 12-3 p.m. and for dinner from 5-9 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday. Stop in for a delicious dining experience.

A children's book, smelly garbage and mating flies: the Kalman Research Symposium

By Kyle Lange
Staff Writer

The second annual Kalman Research Symposium, a forum for students to present their research projects, took place on March 18. The projects, funded by many sources at the University, ranged from a children's book to a study on the mating habits of flies.

Out of the 54 undergraduate participants, 36 had conducted research in the natural sciences and engineering, while 18 had researched topics in the social sciences and humanities. Some participants presented their research in a poster session, while others gave short oral presentations of their research.

Juliana Brafa '05 presented a poster showing different scenes from the children's book that she has written. Under the guidance of Professor of English Michael Payne, she incorporated her interest in women's issues into writing a story about two kittens, complete with pictures and captions. In the story, the two kittens decide that they want to be like their teacher, emulating her in manner and dress, and in the end decide that they are happier being themselves.

Brafa hopes that her book will provide a valuable lesson for young girls.

"Most messages about beauty and self-esteem are given at a young age," Brafa said. "I want to present a positive image of self to young girls."

Not all of the research projects were as aesthetically pleasing as Brafa's. For example, Catherine Webster '04, under the guidance of Associate Professor of Civil and Environmental Engineering Tom DiStefano, presented a poster of her work on the smell of garbage from the Lycoming landfill. She worked on a project investigating different ways to biodegrade food waste. She said that working with garbage was not as bad as it sounds.

"You get used to the smell after a while," Webster said.

By having people smell the different wastes produced by different methods, she was able to rank the methods according to the intensity and offensiveness of the odor. A further extension of Webster's work would be to determine which methods of biodegrading food are the least expensive.

Webster enjoyed her research project and the interaction with other researchers.

"It was good to get a feel of working with a small research team," Webster said.

Other research projects were not as hands-on as Webster's. For example, Jacob Buchanan '03 presented a poster of his research on the habits of black-capped vireos, endangered birds that live in Texas. Buchanan, under the guidance of Assistant Professor of Biology Don Dearborn, studied video recordings to determine if parent black-capped vireos were in any way attracting predators to their nests by their behavior. Although he did not find any connection between types of parental behavior and attracting predators, he did find that the parental effort between males and females was shared equally.

Varano found that while a majority of the universities (79 percent) offered research opportunities in the natural sciences, less than half of them offered research opportunities in the social sciences and humanities. She also found that Bucknell ranks very high in the number of undergraduate research opportunities offered in the various disciplines.

Buchanan considered the research experience to be valuable in his own learning.

"It was a great opportunity to practice science outside the classroom," Buchanan said.

Safiya Abouzaid '04 worked with Assistant Professor of Biology Mary Howe and presented a poster of her research on chromosome mutations. Specifically, she studied mutations in proteins that affect cell division in Caenorhabditis elegans, a species of microscopic worms. She explained the benefits of her research.

"Cell division is very important for organisms," Abouzaid said. "An understanding of cell division in simple organisms could lead to a greater understanding of cell division in more complex organisms like human beings."

Abouzaid plans to write an honors thesis on her research next year.

University President Steffen Rogers attended the poster session and was very enthusiastic about what he saw.

"The student research projects are incredible," Rogers said. "When you ask them about their research, their faces light up. The facial expressions are amazing. It reminds me of when I was an undergraduate and did research with my professor. But my efforts were nowhere near this level of sophistication."

After the poster session, some students gave short presentations of their work. Mais Khamiss '03, under the guidance of Professor of Biology Warren Abrahamson, studied the habits of Eurosta solidaginis, a species of fly that lives in the northern part of the United States. Khamiss gave a short presentation on how female flies are selective in choosing which male flies they will mate with.

The broader applications of Khamiss' research are in how geographic isolation plays a part in evolutionary processes.

Khamiss plans to go to medical school after graduation and considers her research a valuable part of her undergraduate experience.

"The most important part of my research is using the scientific method," Khamiss said. "It is great preparation for graduate school and life after Bucknell."

Amid all of the research projects, there was even a study on undergraduate research itself. Carol Varano '03 worked with Associate Professor of Education Joseph Murray in conducting a literature review on undergraduate research.

"I was an undergraduate researcher researching undergraduate research," Varano said.

Varano took data on undergraduate research opportunities at 62 universities randomly selected from the Council on Undergraduate Research database. She noted the benefits, barriers, models and prevalence of undergraduate research at these institutions.

Varano found that while a majority of the universities (79 percent) offered research opportunities in the natural sciences, less than half of them offered research opportunities in the social sciences and humanities. She also found that Bucknell ranks very high in the number of undergraduate research opportunities offered in the various disciplines.

The first Kalman research grants were given out three years ago, while the first Kalman research symposium occurred last year. Many students have spent summers at the University conducting their research, and some plan to write senior theses on their research.

Airlines in need of financial parachute

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

War in Iraq is beginning to send shock waves through the business community as it has created wild swings in the U.S. stock markets, with stocks celebrating the beginnings of the war and dropping with the prospect of a prolonged effort. Airline carriers like Hawaiian Airlines are filing for bankruptcy and there may be more on the way. In order to prevent this type of collapse, the companies are working with the government to create a workable aid package.

Many travelers are not completely sure if they are safe away from home and are not venturing out on the airlines.

> "This is more about long-term survival than immediate assistance. The relief will not necessarily be 'I'll write you a check right now'—it's about reducing future costs."
> —Airline industry executive

The government is grappling with this possibility—the Bush administration is not sure if it should step in.

The airline industry is working with the government on a relief package. While the details of this potential bailout are still unknown, there are many ideas floating around. According to a report in The Wall Street Journal, the ideas the airlines have included are a takeover of the $4 billion the industry spent to upgrade security following Sept. 11, a reduction of the tax and fee load the companies have from the $9 billion they pay annually and the possibility of reducing jet-fuel prices by using government oil reserves.

"This is more about long-term survival than immediate assistance," said an industry executive [on CNN.com] who is familiar with efforts to win support for a new aid package. "The relief will not necessarily be 'I'll write you a check right now'—it's about reducing future costs. It's not going to take the form of 9/11 assistance (when the industry received $5 billion in direct grants)."

Delta Air Lines said Monday that it would reduce capacity across its system. The Wall Street Journal reported, "The nation's third-largest airline would cut about 12 percent of its domestic and international flights. [In addition,] the nation's largest carrier, American Airlines, said it cut international flights by 6 percent, and analysts anticipate the carrier will announce domestic cuts, as well."

United Airlines is also seeing problems.

"We saw a drop in future bookings as a result of the threat of war, and we expect this to continue with the onset of war itself," Senior Vice President Greg Taylor said in a press release on the company's Web site. "Despite the schedule reduction, we are protecting our route network by primarily reducing the frequency of flights on certain routes. Customers will still have service to all of the markets the airline currently serves, either through convenient connecting or nonstop service."

The drop in travel is significant, especially in the region surrounding the theater of war. Many airlines are not flying into Kuwait anymore and are working hard to fly into the European cities that they know are the right places to place customers. This trend is expected to continue.

Jamie Baker, an analyst at J.P. Morgan in New York, estimates that the number of passengers flying to Europe has declined by as much as 15 percent in the first few weeks of March, while the number of passengers flying domestically has declined only in the "low single digits," The Wall Street Journal reported. Baker said that passengers did not seem to be substituting their postponed European airline trips with domestic flights.

A CNN.com report said that jet-fuel prices have fallen off dramatically in the past month or so. They are now in the area of 80 cents per gallon after seeing $1.2775 per gallon early in March. This is largely due to the hopes for a short war, but other factors like the end of the winter season (when oil is in high demand for home heating) must be kept in mind.

The duration of the war will be a largely determinant factor in how well this relief for the airline industry works. If the United States gets into Baghdad quickly without too many more casualties and can take control of the volatility in the Middle East, the price of oil—and jet fuel—will come down and reduce costs for carriers. In addition, if the war is fast, the airline customers will flock back to the air.

Elizabeth Smart was found March 11 in a Salt Lake City suburb nine months after she was taken by gunpoint from her home 15 miles away. Police say her captors had a huge psychological impact on her.

Elizabeth Smart's father, Ed Smart, said he believes she may have been found sooner if there was a national Amber Alert system in effect.

Amber Alert is a system that immediately notifies police and media when an abduction happens. This system has had great success due to its ability to get information out to the public quickly. When a child is taken, every minute counts.

In spite of widespread support, Amber Alert legislation has been stalled in Congress for months. The House is considering the creation of a national child kidnapping notification network, but not in the form that Elizabeth Smart's parents pleaded for before their daughter's return.

According to CNN, the House could take up the popular Amber Alert legislation later this week. The House Judiciary Committee approved it on March 18 as part of a package of child protection measures. That package is unlikely to win Senate passage.

"It is not something that can wait one more day. Lives are lost. The blood of those children is on someone's head," Ed Smart said to MSNBC.

Ed Smart believes that someone is Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. The House Judiciary Chairman and other House Republicans say the bill's child protection measures are as important as the notification legislation, if not more so. According to MSNBC, Sensenbrenner and his fellow Republican congressmen wrote their own bill, the Child Abduction Prevention Act.

The House bill includes not just an Amber Alert system, but also other provisions, including lifetime supervision for sex offenders, mandatory life in prison for second-convictions for abductors and double the funding for child abuse and abduction prevention.

"I think prevention is much more important than notification, as important as that is," Sensenbrenner said to CNN. "The problem with the Senate Amber bill is that it doesn't do anything that isn't already being done."

According to CNN, Sensenbrenner said the Amber provision, as written, would not do anything that is not already in place at the Justice Department and would not establish a national Amber Alert system.

"When this legislation [Child Abduction Prevention Act] is passed—and it will pass—we will have taken a bite out of child abduction crime and I for one am very proud of that," said Rep. Mark Green, R-Wis., according to MSNBC.

Rep. Robert Scott, D-Va., and Rep. Melvin Watt, D-N.C., voted against the bill, which the Judiciary Committee sent to the House on an 18-2 vote.

According to CNN, Scott said Sensenbrenner's insistence on his full package means the bill will get stuck in a House-Senate negotiating committee for months, instead of going quickly to President George W. Bush for his signature.

Thirty-eight states have enacted their own Amber Alert systems, which involve instantaneously distributing information to various radio and television stations and electronic highway signs. This information can consist of a description of an alleged abductor's vehicle, license plate and physical appearance, and a description of the missing child.

The legislation passed by the Senate and under consideration in the House would direct the Justice Department to assist states that want to establish Amber Alert systems, but it does not require states to take any steps. MSNBC reported that Sensenbrenner said the Judiciary Committee was to hold a hearing this past Tuesday on his legislation and to consider whether to make the Amber system mandatory.

Amber alerts are named after Amber Hagerman, a 9-year-old girl abducted in Arlington, Texas, and later found murdered. Bulletins are distributed quickly through radio and television broadcasts and electronic highway signs about kidnapped children and their abductors. The alerts are credited with the rescues of at least 34 children since 1996, the Justice Department reported.

"I think there's a little politics being played here," House Majority Leader Tom DeLay R-Texas, said to MSNBC. DeLay hopes to bring the Child Abduction Prevention Act, which includes the Amber provision, to the floor for a vote next week.

Historical moment for Chechen voters

By Gretchen Schrock
Business & Politics Editor

The first step toward bringing lasting peace to war-torn Chechnya was taken Sunday as voters flocked to the polls to vote on a controversial new constitution, which would also begin the process of declaring the republic an inseparable part of Russia.

According to The New York Times, approximately 364,000 people, or 65 percent of Chechen registered voters, had cast ballots after only eight hours of the 12-hour polling day. With five hours left to vote, one voting station in Grozny's Leninsky district reported that 75 percent of its 1,210 voters had turned out.

"There's high activity," Abdul Kezim Arsakhano, the chief of the Chechen Election Commission, said to The New York Times. "People are standing in line at some polling places. The people understood that it's a historic moment, and they understood that adoption of the constitution is a way out of today's situation."

The Washington Post reported that 106 of 418 electoral districts disclosed that more than 95 percent of voters supported the constitution, while the BBC reported that, with nearly half the vote counted, 96 percent approved the draft constitution. Official results will not be known until Monday.

The new constitution would set the stage for Chechens to replace their Kremlin-appointed government with a popularly supported, elected one, hastening the end to the war and the occupation by Russian forces. Chechnya wouldpotentially be able to arrange with the Kremlin for broader autonomy, like predominantly Islamic Tatarstan and several other distinctly ethnic provinces, in addition to money to rebuild their devastated society.

"I am only for it, so there will be peace, so there will be laws, so we will be protected," Lidia Darasyan, a resident of the northwest Chechen village of Chernokosovo, said to The New York Times.

Due to possible rebel violence, heavy security was employed during the vote. The Chechen militia and Russian special forces were posted on rooftops, at street corners and along roads leading to polling places.

Though Russian supporters predicted its easy passage, many are questioning how the constitution could promote peace with Islamic guerrillas who "show no signs of giving up their fight," according to The New York Times. But Russian officials insist that a successful referendum will send a powerful message to the rebels that their own people demand that they drop their weapons and admit defeat.

Russian President Vladimir Putin said to the BBC, "All who have not laid down their arms so far are struggling from this moment not only for false ideals, but are directly struggling against their people."

Three and a half years of brutal fighting has destroyed virtually all of Grozny and forced 150,000 refugees to flee, according to The New York Times. The United Nations reported that more than 100,000 still remain in neighboring Ingushetia and of those, 65,000 were eligible to vote in the election.

Support for the constitutional measure remains relatively unstable. According to The New York Times, one only had to look along Staropromyslovskoye Highway outside of Grozny, where fences were covered with graffiti that said: "Referendum is deception," "Referendum is a bluff," "Referendum is a mistake" and "Chechens, don't let anyone deceive you," before government workers painted over them.

> "The conflict cannot be settled by giving them a piece of paper and ordering them to vote. Conflicts are settled by reconciliation. The constitution should come from a consensus, not the other way around."
> —Lord Judd, Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe*

Some critics perceive the referendum as an attempt to avoid peace negotiations with the guerrillas, who continue to kill two dozen Russian soldiers a week and have increasingly used terror as a warfare tactic. The constitution would simply provide Russian rule with a degree of legitimacy, but would greatly fail to mend the ethnic and religious divisions that have resulted in two Chechen wars in the past decade.

"The conflict cannot be settled by giving them a piece of paper and ordering them to vote," Lord Judd, who until recently monitored the Chechen situation for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, said to The Washington Post. "Conflicts are settled by reconciliation. The constitution should come from a consensus, not the other way around."

According to The Washington Post, political analysts view the constitution as a political ploy on the part of Putin, who wants to show his constituents that the Chechen war that helped bring him victory in the 2000 election will end in victory, not an indecisive stalemate.

The New York Times reported that Putin has refused to negotiate with the guerrillas, whom he claims are "foreign-backed terrorists." His solution has been to provide freedom of action to his army in order to defeat the separatists, especially after rebels seized a Moscow theater in October and blew up the Russian government headquarters in December, killing more than 200 people in the two incidents. Most Chechens are equally fearful of the Russian army, which has been charged with "kidnapping and killing innocent citizens in dark-of-night raids and extorting them by daylight."

Last week, Putin admitted to the Chechen public that such military abuses did occur.

Bison win four straight, improve record to 8-4

The Bison baseball team rolled through its first homestand of the season with sweeps of Bloomsburg and Lock Haven, pushing its record to 8-4 overall and 4-0 at home. After a disappointing 15-35 record in 2002, the squad is well on its way to a successful turnaround in 2003.

Twenty-one letterwinners have returned to this year's squad, allowing the Bison a chance to build cohesiveness and strength.

The Bison dominated a double-header against Lock Haven on March 23, outscoring their opponents 9-3 and 10-1.

The previous day, they swept Bloomsburg with emphatic 10-6 and 16-7 victories, the first of which included a historic feat by Brian Hirschberg '04.

The weekend sweep puts the Bison in a promising position as they head into the crucial portion of the season.

"I'm pleased with the potential we have shown for the start of our season," Head Coach Gene Depew said. "After a very long winter we performed well in Florida and this past weekend."

The strong start has the players looking forward to a return to Patriot League dominance.

"I am extremely proud of the way that our team has bounced back from last year's disappointing season," pitcher Kevin Burns '03 said. "We have all worked hard in the off-season and we feel that we have something to prove to all of the people that predicted us to finish fifth in the league this year."

The Orange and Blue had little trouble with Lock Haven on Sunday, banging out 18 hits in the double-header, while the Bald Eagles only managed eight.

The Bison jumped to a 2-0 lead in the third inning of the first game when Ben Stoll '04 scored on a sacrifice bunt by Pete Wolf '04. Wolf, who reached second on an error by the shortstop, scored on a Ben Krentzman '03 single.

The team increased its lead to 5-0 in the fifth inning, capitalizing on three Lock Haven errors with three unearned runs. Sam Moss '04 scored on an errant throw, and Hirschberg and Brian Day '05 reached on consecutive errors by the second baseman.

Day advanced to third on a Krentzman single, and both he and Krentzman scored when Kyle Walter '06 knocked a triple into center field.

The Bald Eagles pulled to within two runs of the Bison after a three-run frame of their own, but never really threatened.

The Bison tacked on a few insurance runs in the second half of the inning, increasing their lead to a comfortable 9-3. After walks to Moss and Wolf and a wild pitch that allowed Moss to advance to third, Hirschberg singled into left field, scoring Moss. A walk to Day loaded the bases for Walter, whose third hit of the day scored Hirschberg and Wolf. A single by Austin Barrett '05 and a sacrifice fly by B.J. Batterson '03 brought home Day to top off the scoring in the sixth inning.

Matt Daley '04 finished off Lock Haven as he struck out three in the seventh inning. Daley and co-captain Zach Allen '03 combined to hold the Bald Eagles to five hits and three runs.

Starting pitcher Allen pitched 5.1 strong innings, giving up three earned runs on just three hits. The effort earned him his second win of the season.

Pitching was paramount for the Bison in the second game of the day as well. As the Orange and Blue offense racked up 10 scores and nine hits, starting pitcher Burns and relievers Cory Nadler '04 and Phil Futrick '06 combined to put a muzzle on Lock Haven's offense all afternoon. The trio allowed just nine hits and one unearned run over seven innings, while striking out four.

Burns retired seven of the first eight hitters he faced, and only allowed two hits over his five innings of work, giving up no earned runs and striking out two. Burns' stint was one of several impressive outings from the Bison pitching staff this year.

The staff's strength and depth will play a crucial roll in the team's bid for a turnaround.

"All our pitchers are throwing the ball extremely well and have the confidence to beat any team we play," Allen said.

Depew also commented on the dependable pitching.

"So far we are getting very good pitching that has allowed us to be competitive in every game," Depew said. "Our offense has not been quite as consistent, but has shown potential to be explosive."

Assistant Coach Rick Ciccione also noted the importance of the team's pitching, as well as the recent potential of the offense.

"The pitching staff has been the anchor of this team throughout the year and the offense was able to put together a good homestand, which should give us momentum heading into Patriot League action this weekend at Holy Cross," Ciccione said.

The Bison offense was as loud as Lock Haven's was quiet, as the Orange and Blue put four runs on the board in the first two innings. Matt Capece '06 and Walter both scored on wild pitches, and Stoll scored on an RBI single by Chris Grandizio '06.

Grandizio knocked in two more RBIs in the fourth inning when he blasted his first collegiate home run to left field. Day also had two RBIs in the inning, capping off a four-run frame for the Bison.

The team finished up the scoring in the sixth when Steve Stutzman '04 scored on a Grandizio sacrifice fly. Futrick sat down three batters in a row to seal the victory.

The two wins followed a high-scoring day against Bloomsburg on March 22. The Bison outscored the Huskies 10-6 and 16-7.

The first game was highlighted by a stellar day for Hirschberg, who became the second Bison in the program's history to hit for the cycle. His second-inning double started the scoring for the day, and he eventually accounted for six RBIs in the game.

Bloomsburg stayed in the hunt until the Bison's four-run seventh inning blew the game open. Moss and Walter reached via bases on balls and Stoll singled before Hirschberg emptied the bases with a grand slam.

Hirschberg hits for cycle

Brian Hirschberg '04 became only the second Bison in the program's lengthy history to hit for the cycle.

Hirschberg made a place for himself in University history on March 22 against Bloomsburg when he hit a double in the second inning, a triple in the fourth, a single in the sixth and a home run in the seventh. In four at-bats, he had four hits, six RBIs and crossed the plate three times.

Hirschberg added a thrilling finale to his superb day when he completed the cycle with a grand slam. Needing a home run to finish off the accomplishment, the right fielder came to bat with the bases loaded and launched the ball out of the park.

"I knew that all I needed was a home run to complete the cycle, so I can't say I wasn't trying to hit one," Hirschberg said. "But the bases were loaded so I was just looking to hit the ball into the outfield."

Hirschberg got the pitch he was looking for and got the job done.

"I just got lucky and got a fastball right down the middle and was able to drive the ball out," Hirschberg said.

Hirchsberg joins Bucknell Hall of Famer Ted Aceto as one of only two Bison players to achieve the distinction. Aceto hit for the cycle in 1989 against Pittsburgh.

The rare achievement was a first for Hirschberg.

"I have never hit for the cycle before," Hirschberg said. "I had no idea that I was only the second person in Bucknell history to accomplish this. It feels pretty good."

Bison women's water polo team dominates the B.U. Invitational

By Pat Evans

The Bison women's water polo team dominated the Bucknell Invitational, winning all four of its games and propelling it into this weekend's league contests. The Orange and Blue beat Michigan State 9-7 on the first day of action, and continued their winning ways against Gannon and Slippery Rock the next day, 8-2 and 12-7, respectively. The team closed out the tournament with a commanding win over Siena 14-4.

The first ever water polo event at the University's new Arthur D. Kinney Jr. Natatorium was against Michigan State, the No. 1 club team in the nation.

There was little scoring in the first half with both team's matching up well defensively. The Bison didn't score a goal until 3 minutes, 3 seconds remaining in the half when Meg Blitzer '05 got her team on the board.

The Bison scored three quick goals to tie the score at three, and then Katie Hartigan '05 shot a buzzer beater just before halftime, which proved to be critical in the team's win.

"The first half we had difficulty scoring," Head Coach John Zeigler said. "Katie's goal just before the half made us a lot more aggressive offensively."

Cody Keffer '05 added three goals in the winning effort, while Hartigan added another goal and contributed defensively with three steals. The Bison never trailed after Hartigan's goal before the half and went on to capture the first win of the tournament and of the new pool.

The next game of the tournament against Gannon proved to be more exciting offensively from the beginning. Blitzer scored the first of the game just 20 seconds into it, and the Bison were unstoppable from then on. Lindsey Chesterfield '03 played a phenomenal game in goal, blocking 10 shots, many of them taken from point-blank range.

Gannon was 10-0 coming into the game against the Bison, but the Orange and Blue felt that they were the better team from the start.

"We were a lot better than they were offensively, and we played with a lot of confidence," Zeigler said. "We attacked every opportunity and got good shots."

Blitzer finished with two goals and added an assist. She attributes her effort to the help she received from the rest of her team.

"We're a very deep team, so that we can all go out there and give it our all, knowing that the level of play won't drop off when we need to come out to get rest," Blitzer said.

Eileen Ketterer '05 and Hartigan scored three goals each and the Bison were again victorious later in the day against Slippery Rock 12-7. The Bison came out strong with an early 4-0 lead capped off by sophomore Kelly Hofstetter's goal with 1:23 left in the first quarter.

Slippery Rock battled back, scoring four of the final six goals of the game, but the early lead that the Bison created was too much to overcome.

"We were prepared for what they were going to do," Zeigler said. "We were confident in our game plan and it worked."

The Bison capped off the undefeated weekend with a huge 14-4 win over Siena in which 12 different players scored for the Orange and Blue. Jennifer Meitzner '06 scored the first two goals of the game just 37 seconds apart, and Ashley Aiken '05 scored an unassisted goal to make it 3-0 after the first quarter.

Zeigler took the commanding lead as an opportunity to play some of the players who normally do not get much game time, but work hard in practice. Three of the game's goals came from athletes who had never scored at the collegiate level going into the match.

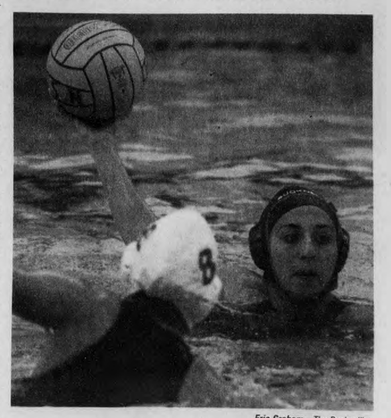
With the four wins of the tournament the Bison improve to 8-8 on the season and remain 3-1 in the league. The team is very happy with how they performed and think it is due in part to the advantage of playing at home.

"It was the first time anyone ever played in that pool," Blitzer said. "So we were really excited, and when we're that pumped up it's easy to find people in the right places and perform well."

The focus of the Bison now is to put their team as highly seeded as possible going into the Southern Tournament at the end of the season.

This weekend the team rematches the four league teams that they went 3-1 against earlier in the season. All four matches will take place at Villanova.

"We need to equal or surpass the effort that we had against these teams earlier in the season," Zeigler said. "It's important, not only for our overall record, but for what seed we draw for the Southern Tournament."



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Vanessa Scaringi '06 looks to pass in a recent game against Siena. Scaringi, Amy Wollish '06 and Ellen Caccia'06 each scored their first collegiate goals of their careers in the final quarter of play.

Scott Schon '00 and Dave Bronfenbrenner '00 have already faced a variety of challenges during their cross country trek, including trudging through inclement weather and improvising in their search for sleeping quarters. The duo is unfazed by the hurdles they face along the way and are still going strong as they traverse the nation.

The vision was further cultivated by hours spent in Bostwick Cafeteria dreaming of the future.

The opportunity finally presented itself as Sehon finished paying off his college loans in December and both he and Brofenbrenner decided that graduate school may be on the horizon.

The talk turned to reality on March 23 in Sea Bright, N.J., as the pair left the Atlantic to head west towards the Pacific.

Unlike the Appalachian Trail or Pacific Crest Trail where set routes exists and tens of thousands attempt to complete them each year, this trip is a one of a kind. Few have traversed this great land by foot, fewer by running and virtually no one without a support crew. The path chosen isn't the shortest transcontinental route, as the pair's goal is to pass through at least one town every day.

The run is for pure adventure, not for fame, not for charity and not for a record. The plan is simple:run 20-30 miles a day carrying the bare essentials and pay no money for lodging. They've accomplished the first part, by initially carrying backpacks, but then switching to a baby jogger.

With the help of David Legerwood '99 and friends, they have created a Web site (www.runtheusa.com) to help put them get in contact with random strangers willing to host them for a night. In compensation, they offer to do a few chores if the host would like, and they tell many tales from the journey.

They posted the URL on the message boards of a couple of running Web sites. Days later this move ended up giving them a healthy endorsement as their site made the picks of the day for both Yahoo.com and USATODAY.com. The 30,000 hits a day the Web site was getting helped them to successfully secure lodging for the first 30 days and has given them contact information for many more nights.

This will certainly turn out to be an adventure of a lifetime. But why did the duo choose this goal? To fully understand, you would have to have met them in high school when they first took up distance running and as college first-year students when they became a part of Bucknell's cross country and track teams. Their devotion and loyalty to the University's teams proved their love for the sport. The five individual Patriot League Titles from cross country and track between them begins to shed light on the fact that they also possess the talent.

The article on "Reach the Beach," in the most recent Bucknell World describes a 200-mile relay in which they took part in and indicates that they have the support of many alumni.

Finally, a steady diet of running 100 miles a week and the completion of a few marathons, including Bronfenbrenner's recent win at the Las Vegas Marathon, show they are dedicated, committed talented and maybe a little crazy.

"Perhaps we are crazy, but our dream has been to do something that very few, if any, people have attempted before. We think that we'd be crazy for not attempting this run," Sehon said. "Craziness is not chasing a dream when given the chance. At 25 years old, no strings attached and in a world where tomorrow is not a guarantee … this is our chance."

Q&A with Sehon and Brof

BUCKNELL

Just two weeks into their journey, Evan Honeyfield chatted with Scott Sehon '00 and Dave Bronfenbrenner '00 when they took a much needed break here in Lewisburg.

Bucknellian: It's obvious that running here at Bucknell had a huge influence on you, but is there anything you leaned while at Bucknell away from running that is helping you through this journey?

Scott: I learned the value of a dollar from having to pay back my loans. The first two years out, I spent basically every extra dollar paying them back. It was worth every penny though.

Bucknellian: What the toughest part of the trip thus far?

Dave: Recovering from the first day. The first day was run pretty quickly with 14 packs on. The extra weight put a seriously hurt our knees and joints.

Bucknellian: Have there been any major surprises or were you pretty well prepared?

Dave: The effect of the packs on our running was huge. Overall, the huge Internet response was surprising.

Bucknellian: What's it like practically becoming a celebrity overnight?

Dave: The e-mails from outside the U.S. were the most inspiring. It's neat to get an e-mail from Russia in broken English saying you should run across Russia next and you'll have a place to stay.

Scott: E-mail from a guy stationed in Kuwait was very humbling. It's cool to get tons of e-mail a day, but that one was really neat. We've gotten a lot of response that feels like it puts a lot of pressure on us to complete this.

Bucknellian: If this run doesn't work out, will there be a second try or something else to take its place?

Dave: The only way we won't finish running is because of a stress fracture. In that case, the injured person would hop on a bike to continue along side the healthy one.

Cecily Cairns—The Bucknellian

Sehon (left) and Bronfenbrenner pause outside of their alma mater's fieldhouse to stretch out and share a few laughs during their Lewisburg stop.

Quote from another famous cross country runner

"That day, for no particular reason, I decided to go for a little run. So I ran to the end of the road, and when I got there, I thought maybe I'd run to the end of town. And when I got there, I thought maybe I'd just run across Greenbow County. And I figured since I run this far, maybe I'd just run across the great state of Alabama. And that's what I did. I ran clear across Alabama. For no particular reason, I just kept on going. I ran clear to the ocean. And when I got there, I figured since I'd gone this far, I might as well turn around, just keep on going. When I got to another ocean, I figured since I've gone this far, I might as well just turn back, keep right on going. When I got tired, I slept. When I got hungry, I ate. When I had to go, you know, I went."

CECILY CAIRNS CLASSIC CORNER

Cecily Cairns

Believe it: McGraw's spirit is unflappable

Until last Tuesday, the most important save of Tug McGraw's life was his strikeout of Willie Wilson to end the 1980 World Series. Philadelphia can thank him for closing the deal on the city's first and only championship, a moment defined by the image of Mike Schmidt leaping ecstatically into the flamboyant relief pitcher's arms.

"Tylenol Tug" saved plenty of games over his 19-year career with the Mets and Phillies—180 to be exact—but is probably best remembered for the life he injected into his teams. A fan favorite in both cities, McGraw was the classic flaky left-handed closer.

He named his pitches. Never afraid to employ his wit at his own expense, he titled one fastball the "Peggy Lee," with reference to the song "Is That All There Is?" Then there was the "Lady Godiva." That one had nothing on it.

His quips are a mainstay of any baseball quote collection. A reporter once asked McGraw whether he preferred grass or AstroTurf.

"I dunno," McGraw replied. "I've never smoked AstroTurf."

It's tempting to wonder, in light of his outlandish antics, if at some point he actually tried just that.

He compulsively slapped his glove on his thigh. He yelled at nothing. One time he dyed his jersey green for St. Patrick's Day, his favorite holiday.

There was never a dull moment with Tug in the game. And there was hardly a moment of pessimism, either.

Watching McGraw bounce through life on the diamond was enough to remind anyone why our country loves baseball so much. His joy just infiltrated into the atmosphere wherever he went.

He wasn't the epitome of perfection on the mound—he was one of the reasons that the 1973 New York Mets were festering in the basement, 12.5 games back halfway through the season. But he was also the one who lit a fire under the team, catapulting them into an epic climb back to respectability—a climb that eventually took them to the World Series.

Legend has it that midway through the season, when the New York squad was still embarrassing itself daily, Mets' chairman Donald Grant had tried to deliver a speech to the hapless team. Somewhere in his lecture, he uttered the words that McGraw would make famous: "You gotta believe."

McGraw, never afraid to cause a scene, loudly repeated the phrase and then stood up and belted it out again, cutting Grant's efforts short. From then on, the lefty took a liking to those three words, yelling them whenever he got the chance.

His exuberance was contagious and sincere enough to make believers out of pretty much everyone.

It's hard not to be optimistic in the presence of someone like that.

Now, 30 years after he formulated the Mets' battle cry, 23 years after he threw the most important pitch in Philadelphia history, McGraw needs all the optimism he can get.

The 58-year-old McGraw, who has been a special instructor at the Phillies spring training camp for two years, noticed a couple of weeks ago that he was having tremors and feeling a little off.

It was hard for observers to tell anything was different—Tug was his usual self, clowning around, joking, smiling.

The smiles faded for Philadelphia when doctors found a reason for McGraw's shakiness—a possibly malignant brain tumor that had spread to both hemispheres of his brain.

He was scheduled to undergo surgery to remove the mass on March 18, the day after his favorite holiday. The Phillies did their best to honor the hospitalized legend with a spirited Irish tribute. Charles Marullo, who sang the national anthem, also sang "When Irish Eyes are Smiling" before the start of the game, and the bases were graced with green shamrocks.

But the king of St. Patty's Day was noticeably absent, lying in a hospital bed at Moffit Cancer Center in Tampa, Fla. waiting for the most important save of his life.

Only this time, it was someone else's turn to do the saving.

Neurosurgeon Steven Brem performed the surgery in six hours, and three days later, McGraw was released from the hospital with a new lease on life. His chances of recovery, according to Brem, are "excellent."

It isn't the first tumor McGraw has had in his life. In 1975, his first year after being traded to the Phillies, the star's lousy pitching and an odd discomfort in his left shoulder made him suspicious. Sure enough, doctors found and removed a gruesome, but benign, mass under the shoulder.

It was a memory that McGraw carried with him for the rest of that season. Literally. In the grand tradition of Tug's unorthodox approach to everything, that tumor spent most of the 1975 season in a little jar of formaldehyde on a shelf in his locker.

He was lucky, in his eyes, and that pickled tumor reminded him of that.

Life dealt him a tougher pitch this time around, though—this was no Peggy Lee, no Lady Godiva.

Rumor has it, although no one in the media can get confirmation, that McGraw's tumor was malignant, which will of course make his battle more of a war. It's a dire situation for anyone, but in Tug's case, optimism is abound in those surrounding him—the Phillies, his former teammates, his family, his doctors.

That's just how it is with Tug. Nothing is hopeless; nothing isn't worth fighting for.

He probably won't bounce smiling into the clubhouse with anything in a jar this time, but you can bet that he won't lose that charm, that zest, that willingness to take everything life hurls at him and find a reason to keep believing.

McGraw once offered this advice to baseball fans: "Always root for the winner. That way you won't be disappointed."

It's probably safe to say that everyone in baseball will be rooting for Tug McGraw. It's not that he was always a winner; he had his moments.

It's that he always gave (and still gives) those he associated with a reason to believe it would all work out in the future. Guys like that never really disappoint.

McGraw didn't just tell people to believe, he made people believe.

And it's easy to see that that isn't going to change anytime soon.

Street cred predictions

Because the NBA playoffs are about as exciting to watch as a taping of Chief Justice William Rhenquist's recitation of an amicus brief while wrestling with a particularly heinous bout of laryngitis, and because my NCAA bracket fairs about as well as Toni Morrison at a Blondie concert, I've decided to shift my witty gaze to a more worthy sport, a gentleman's sport, a sport of numbers, a sport of intimidation.

No, I'm not talking about MathAttack 2K3, though I am ranked fourth in the nation under geometric functions, they call me, "f(Aaron) = the hypotenuse of fun." I am talking about baseball, of course. The only sport where it's legal to have your agent pinch run for you because you aren't allowed to make a decision to steal (bases OR money) without one.

It really is quite interesting how little can change in a sport that manages to straddle the fence on so many complex and game-altering decisions: the designated hitter, drug testing, revenue sharing, player salaries, the All-Star game—the cacophony of problems in baseball is simply staggering.

Where's Pete Rose when you need him? I propose Pete Rose be appointed commissioner, and here's why. He can't be bought out by big business; he prefers used greenbacks slipped under bathroom stalls from his many bookies as opposed to millions of "legitimate" dollars in endorsements and television programming.

Second, he's relentless in his goals. When he was chasing the career mark for hits, he stopped at nothing—including the fact that he lost his swing and couldn't find it if it introduced itself as a betting slip—to reach his target.

With Rose at the helm, do you think that the city of New York combined could pay for two teams at the same cost as for the same cost as 20 AH-64 Apache Attack Helicopters? I don't think so.

Third, all this talk about baseball losing money would vanish because with Rose's cost cutting plan, i.e. tax evasion, major-league baseball wouldn't even need to concern itself with paying for their stadiums. Not to mention Rose's frank demeanor when dealing with baseball executives would be so audacious even Big George Steinbrenner would blush like he just cussed out a 4-year-old.

Regardless, I must make a few predictions here just to boost my "street cred" before the season gets under way. In the American League, I'm picking (surprise, surprise) the New York Yankees, the Oakland Athletics and the Minnesota Twins, with the Boston Red Sox wrapping up the wild-card slot. The Yanks are a lock since the Bo-Sox have proved they can't play baseball after July. The Athletics are also tops with my upset special that the Anaheim Angels will fall like Lucifer to the unworthy depths of "suck." The Twins are in by default simply because no one else in their division is fielding a competitive team. The Sox will barely edge out Seattle and the Yanks won't make the Series for the second year in a row because there is such a thing as too much talent. The A's will head to the series because they are the best all-around "team"; the competition is weaker this year in the AL, and because the Yankees' heads will be too big for their shoulders.

In the National League, we have to stick with the steady Arizona Diamondbacks, St. Louis Cardinals and Atlanta Braves with my NL upset special L.A. Dodgers edging the Philadelphia Phillies in the wild card. The Diamondbacks will benefit from Byung Hyun Kim in the rotation and a youngen at first base. The Cardinals are the Twins of the National League, with no other strong teams in their division, though Houston and Chicago may give them a scare. The NL East looks like the toughest division in baseball, with major offseason acquisitions for all the teams (except, of course, the Expos), including Ivan Rodriquez, Cliff Floyd, Jim Thome, Mike Hampton and Tom Glavine. The Braves will pull it out because their rotation is stronger than any other, though the Mets and Phillies will be threats late into the season. The Dodgers will take the wildcard only because they play a lot of strong intradivisional teams, but they have the best all-around rotation and solid lineup in the league. If they can stay healthy (a sports analyst catchall phrase), they'll make it to the World Series, barely ousting the Cardinals.

Major-league baseball's globalization problems

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

Over the past several years, major-league baseball (MLB) has been making serious efforts to showcase its product to global markets by playing games outside of the United States and Canada. The globalization of MLB started when the league decided to play spring training games outside of Florida and Arizona. Exhibition games have been held in Mexico and even in front of Fidel Castro in Cuba. You would be hard-pressed to find a downside to playing exhibition games in foreign markets. These games help create interest and merchandise sales for MLB in other countries.

The positive results of such exhibition games have given MLB executives greater ambitions. They have decided that showcasing spring training games is not enough. Rather, they have decided to begin playing regular season games in other countries.

On March 29-30, 2000, MLB made history when the New York Mets and Chicago Cubs opened the regular season in Tokyo, Japan, making it the first season opener played outside of North America. The league had opened the season in Mexico in 1999, but was now expanding its reach further around the globe. The Oakland Athletics and Seattle Mariners were supposed to open this season in Japan, but the trip was cancelled due to security concerns resulting from Operation Iraqi Freedom. Still, the globalization of MLB will reach even greater proportions this season. The Montreal Expos, who are struggling to survive financially, will play about one-quarter of their "home" games this year in Puerto Rico.

While playing regular season games in foreign markets works wonders for exposing the game to other cultures, it has a detrimental impact on the integrity and fairness of the game for MLB players and fans.

"Playing regular season games in foreign markets works wonders for exposing the game to other cultures, it has a detrimental impact on the integrity and fairness of the game for MLB players and fans."

In 2000, when the Mets and Cubs had to open the season on the other side of the globe a week earlier than everyone else, they were given an immediate disadvantage over their competitors. Both teams' spring workouts were cut by one week, as they had to leave for Japan a week before the rest of the teams in the league opened the season. Losing a week of exhibition workouts made the Mets and Cubs more susceptible to early season rust and both mental and physical errors.

Furthering the disadvantage that the 2000 Mets and Cubs faced was the severe jet lag that they suffered upon returning home. Each team was only given three days off between its last game in Japan and its first game in America. The long trip and plane flight obviously had a negative impact on the teams. The Mets, who would eventually go on to represent the National League in the World Series, struggled, going 2-5 in their first seven games after returning home. The Cubs also had difficulty adjusting, losing their first three games and five of their first six.

Another problem that arises from playing in foreign markets is the risk of injury from playing fields that are not kept up to MLB standards. While playing in the Tokyo Dome, several Mets and Cubs stumbled while starting from the batter's box to first base. These falls were the result of the softer clay that the Tokyo Dome had in the batter's boxes. The players were used to the harder clay in North America and took nasty spills as a result. Fortunately, no players were seriously hurt, but I would have loved to have seen what would have happened had Sammy Sosa or Mike Piazza been injured for the season due to loose clay in the batter's boxes.

Finally, fans of teams that open the season in foreign countries are hurt by international games. Both the Mets and Cubs played one fewer game at home in front of an enthusiastic crowd. The teams' loyal fans had one fewer chance to see their favorite players in person. Even worse for Mets and Cubs fans, if they wanted to watch the Japan games on television, they had to get up at 5 a.m. EST.

Many of these problems are going to be magnified for the Montreal/Puerto Rico Expos and their fans during this upcoming season. With the Expos playing 22 games in Puerto Rico to see if it is a viable market for expansion, the team will likely struggle due to the mental and physical toll of excessive traveling. Having to travel long distances to "home" games will likely wear the Expos out before the end of the season. The players will also become mentally drained, as they will not be able to stay at home with their families during "homestands."

Expos fans (if there actually are any) will also have significantly fewer opportunities to get to Olympic Stadium to see their team. The Expos will lose loyal fans since they will no longer have one true home. The league should either contract the Expos or let them play full time in Montreal, but should not make them have two "homes."

Don't get me wrong; exposing MLB to foreign countries can reap tremendous benefits, but the league must be exposed in a way that will not place some teams at an unfair disadvantage.

THERE'S NOT ENOUGH ART IN OUR SCHOOLS.

NO WONDER PEOPLE THINK

CARAVAGGIO

IS A GUY ON THE SOPRANOS.

It's hard to believe. Here's a 16th-century Baroque master whose bold naturalistic painting style first created a sensation, then a movement. A guy whose life was filled with the turbulence and excess of more than a dozen Mario Puzo novels.

If you're looking for Caravaggio, you're very, very cold.

A self-portrait of Caravaggio as Bacchus. Honestly, he wouldn't last 10 minutes on The Sopranos.

This guy who, while troubled, ultimately found redemption and immortality in his art. But does the average kid on the street even know who Caravaggio is?

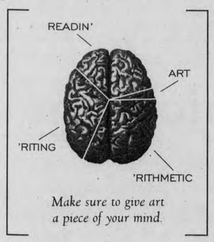
Fuhgedaboudit.

Too bad. Especially when you consider how much our children can learn from the conflicted life of a great artist like Michelangelo Caravaggio.

He grew up in less than ideal circumstances. Most of his family died in the plague. Much of his youth was misspent on the mean streets of Rome. And as a young artist he struggled for years to make a living. He was angry. Yet the angry contrast between light and darkness in his work is the very reason why it now hangs in countless museums around the world.

If nothing else, it's a case study of the importance of having art as an outlet. Unfortunately, one we're fast removing from our kids' lives.

If the arts are indeed a vital part of your child's education (and studies show you believe they are), then you should demand his or her fair share. To find out how to help, or for more information about the benefits of arts education, please visit us at AmericansForTheArts.org. Because, as Caravaggio would tell you, life without art is torture.



Make sure to give art a piece of your mind.

Julie Williams '06 gains her second win of the season. Williams has helped lead the Bison to their only two victories.

Bison pick up second victory

By Michelle Martin
Feature Layout Editor

The Bison softball team won its first game of the season with a 3-2 victory over Siena on March 22.

The Orange and Blue were down 1-0 after the first inning, but Julie Williams '06 kept the deficit low as she pitched out of a jam. There was only one base runner over the next five innings for either team.

The Bison broke the streak, as Gill reached on an error and Jennifer Ross '05 singled to break up Siena pitcher Tisha Salamino's perfect game. Alyssa Schneebaum '06 sacrificed Gill and Ross into scoring position. Pompeii grounded out to first, allowing Gill to cross the plate to tie the game. Ross scored the go-ahead run on an error. Stackhouse then doubled in Kristen Potts '05, who had reached base on the error, for the insurance run.

Siena scored once more in the top of the seventh, but Bucknell held on for the 3-2 win. The Bison committed no errors in the game, and Julie Williams '06 picked up her second pitching victory.

In Saturday's nightcap, they lost 2-0. Siena again scored first, but this time did not allow the Bison back into the game. The Orange and Blue had a chance to score in the bottom of the sixth, when Pompeii led off with a single and was sacrificed by Potts to second. Stackhouse was walked, but a fielder's choice and a pop-up ended the rally.

The Bison lost both games to Siena last Sunday, dropping to 2-14 on the season. In the second game of the day, they were down 3-1 heading into the bottom of the seventh inning.

A Kris Devore '06 single and a Meredith Gill '03 walk, followed by sophomore Kelli Haskins' sacrifice fly, set up the scoring play. Jill Pompeii '05 nailed a two-RBI single to send the game into extra innings. Neither team could score a run until the top of the 11th, when two Siena hits and two Bucknell errors helped the Saints tack on five runs. The deficit was too great to overcome, as the final verdict was 8-3.

Earlier in the day, the Bison dropped a 6-2 decision. They got on the board first with one run in the bottom of the first inning. Angela Stackhouse '04 hit a two-out single to left field and then stole second base to get into scoring position. Lauren Wible '06 capitalized on the opportunity and singled in Stackhouse. Siena knotted the game at one in the top of the fourth inning and then opened it up with five more runs in the fifth. The Bison got one run back in the bottom of the fifth, but it was not enough.

With regard to the overall series, the Bison picked up their defense and continued to work on their offense.

"The pitchers threw really well, and we played good defense for the most part," Stackhouse said.

She also said that they are working hard on "stringing together hits to score runs," rather than the several scattered hits they have been getting.

The Bison return to action at noon tomorrow, with the first two games of a four-game league series against Holy Cross. They look to improve upon the weaknesses they showed in the Siena series to add more wins to their record.

Men's lax improves to 4-2

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The 19th-ranked Bison men's lacrosse team bounced back from a 14-8 loss to No. 3 Maryland, dominating its home openers against Mount St. Mary's and Holy Cross, winning 16-4 and 13-4, respectively. The Orange and Blue are now 4-2 overall, and the win over Holy Cross gives them their first league victory, putting them at 1-0 in the Patriot League.

The Bison jumped to an early 6-0 lead on Mount St. Mary's with five different goal scorers tallying the first five goals of the game. The team took advantage of Mount St. Mary's penalty situations, scoring five extra-man goals and cruising to a 9-1 halftime lead.

Chris Cara '05 added two assists to complement his four goals and teamed up with Wes Fetcher '04 to lead the offensive attack for the Bison.

"Everyone played really well," Cara said. "The midfield got us the ball and that made it very easy for the offense."

Head Coach Sid Jamieson said that the key to the game was the Bison's excellent job of riding Mount St. Mary's. The Bison were able to capitalize on opportunities when Mount St. Mary's goalie was out of the net.

"When you are able to ride well, you are not only able to regain possession of the ball, but with them spread out, it makes it hard for them to regroup," Jamieson said. "That demoralized them and gave us something to feed off."

Blaise Fletcher '04 and Justin Slama '03 in particular did a great job defensively and were able to give the ball to the scorers for the Bison, with Slama even scoring himself, something that is unusual for a midfielder.

"It's great to see those guys be able to run the field with great skills," Jamieson said. "When you've got a defense that can do that, it's very dangerous."

After the Bison were up 14-1, they cleared the bench and gave some players the opportunity to play who normally don't get the chance.

"Something that I've never done is to rub a team's nose into the ground," Jamieson said. "It's not about that. It's about sportsmanship, and there was no need to keep our best players in after a certain point in that game."

The Bison were able to clear their bench early on in the Holy Cross game as well, but not until they were woken up by an early Crusaders 2-1 lead. After two early goals, the Bison defense did not allow another until midway through the fourth quarter.

"We came out really flat and were maybe a little bit overconfident," Cara said. "But eventually we woke up and got our game plan going."

Once again the success was due to the Bison's ability to prevent Holy Cross from clearing the ball. The Orange and Blue saw great efforts from their midfielders and riders and this was what propelled their offense.

"This was not a great game for us offensively," Jamieson said. "But the riding game compensated for what we were unable to do on offense."

Midfielder John Terracciono '03 showed the Bison's ability to do this when he scored on a long shot to make the score 4-2. Right after that Cara stole a ball at the offensive end of the field and put one in. Slama then took the ball from the goalie and passed to Cara for another quick one, giving the Bison a comfortable four-goal lead early on.

Maybe the most impressive example of the Bison's versatility was when Fletcher made a coast-to-coast run with the ball to score his first career goal and cap off a 10-0 run for the Bison.

Dennis Geraghty '03 tallied four goals in the win and Cara added three. Andrew Copelan '03 contributed a career-high four assists in the win.

The Bison now have the biggest game of the season coming up this weekend against Hobart. Last year Hobart won the Patriot League contest defeating the Bison in the three-way tie scheme to earn an NCAA Tournament bid. This year the Bison know what they have to do to come out on top and win the league outright to gain the tournament berth.

"We have to have very good control of the ball and be very careful with our possessions," Jamieson said. "We are playing a school that at one point won 12 national championships in a row, so this is a national powerhouse of a program. We're going to have to be at the top of our game."

The Bison don't view the game as seeking revenge on last year's loss. The players do know that if they don't win this, they probably will not get into the NCAA Tournament, which has been their main focus for this season.

"This game is absolutely huge and would almost make or break our season," Cara said. "We're playing well right now and we expect to win."

Justin Sussman '03 guards the net in a previous game. Sussman recorded 10 saves for the Bison against Mount St. Mary's in the team's home opener on March 19 and eight saves against Holy Cross on Saturday.

Women's lacrosse scores first P.L. triumph

By Cecily Cairns

The women's lacrosse team bounced back after losing a heartbreaker to Lafeyette to claim an 11-3 win over Lehigh on Wednesday. The team demonstrated their tenacity despite bus trouble that delayed their arrival at Lehigh.

"This season could get very interesting and we are definitely up to the challenge. I think yesterday's win was a huge turning point especially after the loss on Saturday. It was great to see it all come together and it was something we all needed," Nichole Kallis '03 said.

The Bison jumped to a 7-0 lead in the first half against Lehigh and never let the Patriot League foe get within striking distance. The team scored four goals within the game's first 10 minutes, including two by Amy Hasler '04, one by Elizabeth Schuster '04 and one by Suzanne Raffaele '03.

Raffaele netted her second goal of the game 17 minutes, 11 seconds into the game. In addition to her two goals, Raffaele also had two assists during the game.

By the end of the half, the Bison had a seven-point lead, capped by Hasler's third goal of the day.

The team continued to pound out points in the second half, as Meredith Wright '04 and Andrea Paraud '05 scored to make it 9-0. Lehigh didn't score until 15:16 into the second half.

Lehigh attempted to scratch its way back into the game, but the Bison scored two more goals of their own to put the game out of reach for their opponents. Paraud scored her second goal and Amy Lee '05 put on in the net as well.

The Orange and Blue outshot Lehigh 24-23, earning their first Patriot League win of the season. Kallis was solid in the goal, stopping 12 shots and only allowing three to pass her.

The victory was especially sweet after the frustrating start to the season.

"For our game against Lehigh the girls had something to prove," Head Coach Randall Flynn said. "Not to the fans, or the school, or the other teams in the league, but to themselves: that they are a very strong team and are renewed from last year."

The team's efforts certainly proved that the Bison are determined to overcome anything throw their way.

"The girls pushed through all the distractions of the day to play one of the most well executed games I have ever seen in women's lacrosse," Flynn said.

The win pushed the team's record up to 2-4 and 1-2 in the Patriot League. It was an encouraging win for the team, especially after a rough loss to Lafayette on Saturday.

A second half rally from the defending Patriot League Champion Leopards handed the Bison their second league loss of the season as they fell 8-7.

The Orange and Blue jumped to an early lead, scoring three unanswered goals in the first five minutes. Hasler, Wright and Victoria Field '06 each contributed a goal to the scoring streak.

Hasler scored again, making the score 4-1, but Lafayette answered with 7:53 left in the half. Laura Nuss '04 snuck in another score with just 8 seconds on the clock to give the Orange and Blue a 5-2 halftime lead.

Lafayette didn't hesitate in reducing the deficit in the second half, scoring just 1:08 into the frame. Although Raffaele netted one just a minute later to regain the Bison's three-point lead, Lafayette went on a scoring tear with three unanswered goals to even the score at 6.

Cora Preston '05 soon made it 7-6 in favor of the Bison, but with 14:18 remaining, Lafayette netted the tying goal, and at 13:46 it jumped ahead 8-7, where the score remained for the duration of the contest.

The Bison only got six shots off in the second half, compared to 10 in the first, while the Leopards managed 17 shots in the second. Lafayette outshot Bucknell 28-16 over the course of the game.

"This past Saturday's loss to Lafayette was particularly disappointing to the team because they had worked so hard and focused so much on improving themselves," Flynn said.

After the uplifting victory over Lehigh, the Bison hope to keep things rolling when the squad takes a shot at another Patriot League competitor when they face off against Holy Cross on March 29. The home game begins at noon.

Flynn looks forward to the rest of the season.

"The great thing is, the girls are responding well to the many changes we have made and are clicking more and more with every practice," Flynn said.

Bison look forward to P.L. regular season

The win went to starting pitcher Kevin Miller '04, who allowed six hits and three earned runs over six strong innings. Miller is off to an excellent start this season after pitching a nine-inning shutout of Harvard during spring break, a feat that earned him the Bull Run Athlete of the Week title.

The second game saw the Bison produce a season-high 16 runs, 11 of which came during an electric seventh-inning rally.

With the score knotted at 5, the Bison broke the game open. Phil Bunting '05 scored on an error and Batterson scored on a Capece single. After recording two outs, relief pitcher Mike Kelchak walked Hirschberg, Walter and Stoll, scoring Capece and Moss.

Bunting and Capece both tripled, contributing five RBIs to the inning. Moss finished up the scoring with a two-run homer.

Bloomsburg attempted a rally of its own, but the team only managed two runs before co-captain R.J. Grant '03 shut down the Huskies' effort and sealed the victory. Grant was on the mound for the Bison for the entire seven innings, giving up eight hits and six earned runs and striking out four. It was his second win of the season.

Grant was pleased with the team's weekend, but knows that the crucial games are down the road, as the Bison set their sights on Patriot League opponents.

"These are games that you're expected to win, and we did a good job of securing four victories," Grant said. "The real season starts this weekend against Holy Cross and we plan on surprising some people that have written us off after last season's disappointing campaign."

Burns also noted the importance of the upcoming series with Holy Cross.

"Our early success can only be attributed to each player's hard work, but we still have some business to take care of in the league, starting this weekend with Holy Cross," Burns said.

Ciccione feels confident that the team can re-establish its dominance in the league.

> "I am extremely proud of the way that our team has bounced back from last year's disappointing season. We have all worked hard in the offseason and we feel that we have something to prove to all of the people that predicted us to finish fifth in the league this year."
> —Kevin Burns '03

"We are looking forward to the Patriot League season since we have a lot of teams to pay back from last year," Ciccione said. "If we continue to progress the way we have, there is no reason we should not once again be vying for the Patriot League Championship this May."

The Bison got a late start to their season after 10 cancellations due to harsh winter conditions. The squad did not let the delay halt its momentum.

"The guys have stayed upbeat and have really made the most of their opportunities," Ciccione said.

The team finally saw some action when it traveled to Bradenton, Fla., over spring break.

The Bison opened the season with a loss against St. Bonaventure, but went on to defeat Harvard, University of Rhode Island and Yale in consecutive wins, eventually finishing the trip with a 4-4 mark.

Grant said that spring break games are most important for the Bison.

"We knew it was important to get off to a strong start," Grant said. "We beat some solid teams in Florida with a combination of solid pitching and timely hitting. Most importantly, the spring trip gave us the confidence we needed to begin the season."

That confidence has certainly been bolstered by the team's recent wins and will continue to fuel the team as it heads to Holy Cross for a pair of weekend games.

"I am really pleased at our team's progress to start this season," Allen said. "We have all worked really hard in our preparation for our upcoming Patriot League games."

Both games at noon, the Bison face Holy Cross on March 29 and 30.

"We are looking forward to beginning the Patriot League season this weekend with the goal of putting ourselves back in contention for a league title," Depew said. "The 20-game league schedule is what we focus on as the most important part of our season. We need to finish in the top three to participate in the post season tournament."

Women's tennis suffers first loss

Women are 8-1 heading into Patriot League matches

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The women's tennis team suffered its first loss of the season to Pittsburgh 4-3, but bounced back to beat Duquesne 4-3. Earlier in the week the Bison swept Loyola 7-0. The team is now 8-1 as it heads into Patriot League matches.

The men's team continues to have difficulty, dropping matches to St. Bonaventure 5-2 and Buffalo 6-1. The Bison are confident that they can pick up two league wins against Lafayette and Lehigh to salvage something from an otherwise disappointing season.

The women's 7-0 win over Loyola was much closer than the score indicates. It took all three sets for five of the six singles players to win, and the doubles contests were just as challenging with the Orange and Blue pulling out two of the three to gain the point.

"I was confident going in that we could win, but I never dreamed of us beating them 7-0," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "It just makes it more obvious that we are competing really well right now."

> "I was confident going in that we could win, but I never dreamed of us beating them 7-0. It just makes it more obvious that we are competing really well right now."
> —Rebecca Helt, tennis head coach

Nadezda Curcic '05 and Veronica Brown '06 were both 6-4 first-set losers but rallied back to take the wins. Samantha Berthod '04 also dropped her first set before rounding out the Bison scoring with a 5-7, 6-0, 6-3 win.

"I think it's our desire to win that's helping us close out close matches," Berthod said of the win over Loyola.

The Bison's next matches against Pittsburgh proved to be more difficult as a 4-3 loss ended their seven-game winning streak. The matches again came down to the final sets but this time the Bison were unable to finish them off.

"Pittsburgh is a very solid and very deep team. And we didn't perform as well as we have been in the spring," Helt said. "If we had pulled together mentally we could have won, but we didn't do that this time."

Rheanna Gaskin '06 and Berthod were the Bison's sole singles winners. Gaskin won 6-4, 6-0 in the fifth flight, while Berthod won 6-1, 6-3. Berthod improved to 8-0 on the season with the win.

"I think being named captain has helped me play a lot better because I see that I need to focus on how to set a good example for the rest of the team," Berthod said.

The Bison bounced back from the Pittsburgh loss to take care of Duquesne 4-3 the next day.

The team won three singles matches and got the doubles point as Curcic teamed up with Brown, and Jill Wurzburg '03 joined Berthod to finish the day with a win.

"We still didn't play all that well, but we pulled out the doubles win, which was crucial for the 4-3 overall win," Helt said.

The men's team has continued to struggle, dropping 5-2 to St. Bonaventure this past Saturday. The Bison's sole winners were Joe Menezes '05 and Aaron Saperstein '06. Later in the day proved to be just as frustrating as the Bison lost to Buffalo 6-1.

Asher Salam '06 was the Bison's sole singles winner in the match. Saperstein and Menezes joined up as a doubles team to win, but Buffalo captured the remaining two matches to take the point. Menezes and Gerald DiChiara '05 gave their opponents all they could handle in the fourth and fifth flights of singles play, respectively, but in the end were defeated.

"Our first goal is to get by Lafayette and Lehigh, which we think we can do," Helt said. "We were picked to finish last in the Patriot League and we are going to do everything we can to make sure that doesn't happen."

The women are in action on Thursday at Mount St. Mary's, while the men travel to Navy and American this weekend.

Mark Project brings Gospel to life

By Dave Allen
Staff Writer

Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship brought the Mark Project to the University for a second year on March 20. This dramatic interpretation of the Gospel of Mark attracted a large audience to the Terrace Room as two actors gave stirring performances, bringing to life a centuries-old text detailing the adult life and ministry of Jesus Christ.

Actors Daniel Jones and Alison Siewert performed on a simple stage with very few props or set pieces. Rather than surrounding the message of the Gospel with the adornment of costumes or scenery, Jones and Siewert let the text speak for itself as an example of who Jesus is and the relevance that his teachings still have today.

The traditional text was periodically interspersed with dramatic "testimonials" from characters connected with the stories of the miracles that Jesus performed. These interruptions were sometimes humorous, but always provided valuable insight into the meaning of the text. The tone of much of the first half was similar to that of "Godspell," a popular musical from the 1970s that also retells gospel lessons.

Some of the most notable narrations were from the disciple Simon's wife after he decided to follow Jesus, from a leper healed by Jesus and from the man ordered to carry Jesus' cross for him before his crucifixion. These testimonials gave depth and personality to characters and stories that have remained largely the same through the many versions of the Bible.

The most memorable scene of the first act was the portrayal of the story of Jesus healing the paralyzed man. In the scene, Jones played one of the man's friends who lowered him through the roof and Siewert played the wife of the man who owned the house. Jones' character, seeming doubtful, said, "It wasn't the first healer we visited, just the most overcrowded."

Questioning the safety of lowering the man through the roof, Siewerts character said, "Bring him in from up there?" Both characters were amazed, though, when the paralyzed man picked up his mat and walked away as Jesus had commanded him.

After intermission, the second half of the program began in the same way that the first half ended; Jones portrayed Jesus asking his disciples, "Who do people say I am?" and then, "Who do you say I am?"

Jones said that one of the motivations in giving this performance is, "How can we get people in and get them to ask big questions?"

The second half contained many dramatic portrayals of well-known scripture lessons, including the Last Supper, Jesus' betrayal, Peter's denial of Jesus and Jesus' crucifixion. The lighting highlighted several of the scene changes in the program's second half—blue light for Jesus praying in the garden of Gethsemane and red and amber light for the scene where Peter angrily denies knowing Jesus. The tone of the performance grew visibly more emotional and the actors delivered their lines with greater urgency as Jesus' crucifixion was foreshadowed.

The portrayal of the crucifixion was the most emotional and wrenching scene of the production, as Jones stood crying out with his arms extended while Siewert delivered a grave narration of Jesus' treatment at the hands of the Roman soldiers. After the show, several audience members said that this was the scene that was most memorable for them. The performance came to a sudden and silent conclusion soon after the portrayal of Jesus' body being removed from the tomb, and audience members were left to meditate on what they had just witnessed.

Siewert and Jones are both employed by the National Chapter of Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship. Jones said they came up with the idea for the Mark Project as a venture in investigative Bible study.

"We were looking for a fresh approach," Jones said.

The project was first performed at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa., then at other colleges in Pennsylvania. In the past year, Siewert and Jones have taken their production on tour to other places, including California and Toronto. According to Erin Michener '03, an organizer of the event through the University's Inter-Varsity group, the project is "getting a lot of people excited, so we are getting some discussion groups organized."

Both actors were available for questions after the performance, and many students stayed after to discuss Scripture and their opinions of the project.

Kings of Leon rock 'n' roll

Band combines two genres to create a new wave of classical rock

By Josh Herwitt
Staff Writer

❖ CD Review

With the majority of the modern rock world fusing multiple styles and elements to develop an innovative, hybrid sound, Kings of Leon revives an aged rock movement combining the sounds of Southern blues and Sixties rock 'n' roll. This new wave of Southern, classic rock dominates the band's 2003 compact disc, "Holy Roller Novocaine."

Tennessee natives Caleb Followill (lead singer, rhythm guitar), Nathan Followill (drums), Jared Followill (bass) and Matthew Followill (lead guitar), formed their garage band two and a half years ago and hit the music world with their 2002 signing with RCA Records. Moving to Nashville at 18, brothers Caleb, Nathan and Jared began writing songs, later adding first cousin Matthew to the group.

Just under 16 minutes long, "Holy Roller Novocaine" features five short songs. "Molly's Chambers" and "Wasted Time," tracks one and two on the EP, create a mixture of Southern rock 'n' roll and blues. "California Waiting" has a traditional classic rock rhythm with captivating, controlled vocals inviting listeners to sing and hum along. The slow pace and intricate guitar focus of "Wicker Chair" contributes to the overall assortment. The CD concludes with the title track, "Holy Roller Novocaine," the longest of the five songs. The steady beat and Southern guitar round out the CD with a simple yet traditional rock feel that interests new fans in hearing more.

This five-song CD was released Feb. 18. The band continues to work hard and will soon record its first album in Los Angeles with producer Ethan Johns.

Comedian cracks up the crowd

Michael Collins' stand-up comedy involved many topics, from Iraq to TV

By Josh Herwitt
Staff Writer

❖ Comedy Review

The multitude of jokes, silly facial expressions and playful gestures of stand-up comedian Michael Collins left many students laughing hysterically on their way home from the Bison Friday night.

Collins, who was born in Harrisburg, Pa., and now resides in Gainesville, Fla., performs primarily in small Southern clubs. Most notably, Collins has performed on ESPN and on other television presentations.

His stand-up was an assemblage of his own personal experiences, opinions and advice on subjects such as sexual relations and the racial issues around the world. He discussed the recent matters of war with Iraq and emphatically included his obsession with Discovery Channel, Animal Planet, TLC and other education television channels. His subjects of comic taboo in specific instances were especially hilarious to those in attendance.

Along with these subjects, Collins altered his voice throughout the performance to add further comic relief. These spontaneous transformations in Collins' voice often resulted in fits of laughter from students.

On the whole, Collins' stand-up performance was not only amusing and hilarious, but also provocative in his discussion of several significant, mundane issues. The performance was creative, thoughtful and witty.

As students left the Bison at the conclusion of the Campus Activities and Programs- and Activities and Campus Events-sponsored show, their smiles were sufficient evidence to indicate the quality of Collins' work.

Audience travels back in time with Bach Choir concert

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

❖ Concert Review

The Bach Choir of Bethlehem, accompanied by the Bach Festival Orchestra, gave a concert Saturday Night in the Weis Center.

The signature piece of the evening, a sacred cantata by Johann Sebastian Bach, began the night's program. According to program notes, this cantata went through several forms and revisions before becoming the familiar piece that it is today. The title, "Ich hatte viel Bekummernis," translates to "I had so much distress." The German/English translations for this, as well as all the lyrics for of the evening's pieces, were provided in a program supplement for the audience.

Photos by Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

The Bach Festival Orchestra performs "Ich hatte viel Bekummermis" in the Weis Center. The group, performing with the Bach Choir of Bethlehem, received a standing ovation Saturday night.

The cantata began with an instrumental section, or sinfonia, performed by the orchestra. The introduction featured a solo by oboist player Mary Watt. The entrance of the chorus, singing the piece's title, followed this sinfonia. Although the choir contains over 104 local volunteer singers, its sound was clear and subdued.

Impressed by the choir, audience member Mark Wilkins said, "One word to describe it is 'bright'—all their music had this bright quality."

After the song performed by the full chorus, soloist Kendra Colton was featured in a soprano aria, supported only by the simple sound of the strings. A minimal solo texture was continued in the next section, highlighting Frederick Urrey in a tenor recitative. The recitative blended into a tenor aria, which is more virtuosic and song-like in nature. The chorus entered again, with the same blend as before, ending the first section.

The second part, the Zweiter Teil, began with a recitative and aria between bass, performed by Mark Andrew Cleveland, and soprano. The use of the interplay between these two voices created a more dramatic sound with the focus on the two soloists. After the duet, the large chorus came in for a darker "Chorus with chorale" based on a traditional chorale hymn. A bright tenor aria was followed by a powerful and dramatic choral ending.

The second large piece of the evening was a Mass by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. The combination of these two great composers was acknowledged by Stephanie Wright '06.

"It was really neat to hear Bach and Mozart together," Wright said. "It's a combination I haven't heard that often."

The form of the Mozart piece, "Great Mass in C Minor K427," sets the five traditional parts of the Roman Catholic Mass to music. Mozart began with the "Kyrie," sung by the chorus, with a soprano solo performed by Rosa Lamoreaux. Her singing led into the dynamic and powerful full chorus piece, the "Gloria." Mozart added several other solos and large chorus numbers between the "Gloria" and the next Mass part, the "Credo."

The full chorus and orchestra, with a large bright sound, then performed the "Credo." Kendra Coiton performed a smooth and lyrical soprano aria. After this seemingly subdued moment, the chorus began once again with the final Mass part performed, the "Sanctus." The contrast between the power and volume of the two was dramatic. All four soloists were then highlighted a final time in a quartet that featured soprano, mezzo-soprano, tenor and bass. The chorus then joined, ending with a sound emphasis on the lyrics, "Osanna in excelsis!" which translates to "Hosanna in the highest!"

In addition to the two large pieces performed by the choir that evening, three of Bach's smaller songs, a double chorus, a chorale and aria and a final double chorus were performed.

The night's music had a stirring effect on the audience members, evident by the long standing ovation. Wilkins found the concert to be accurate and inspirational.

"It really took you back to the period," Wilkins said. "It was so accurately done you knew what it felt like to be back then in the 17th century. You could see the great influence that religion had on them then, but above everything, it was just very ... ethereal."

The United States, Britain and Spain propose a resolution to the U.N. Security Council to authorize use of military force against Iraq. France, Germany and Russia submit an informal counter-resolution to the Council arguing that there is "a real chance to the peaceful settlement of this crisis." The United States and Britain's intense lobbying efforts among the other U.N. Security Council members yield only four supporters. The United States decides not to call for a vote on the resolution.

Students study traffic safety of local area

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

Students in Professor of Civil and Environmental Engineering Richard McGinnis' Introduction to Transportation Engineering class have been testing the impact of traffic in three areas of Lewisburg for two months, including the impact of the potential erection of a Giant Supermarket on Route 15.

The eight groups in the class are working both in parallel and together. Three groups of students have been working on a traffic study for the potential Giant Supermarket, three groups are working on a traffic circulation study for the University and two groups are working on a traffic impact study for the safety of the intersection on North Fourth Street and Route 15.

The class will present its findings to the East Buffalo Township (EBT) Planning Commission on April 23. According to McGinnis, East Buffalo Township is the municipality that incorporates the majority of the campus.

"The work of Bucknell students under the guidance of Professor McGinnis will enable EBT residents to understand more fully the impact of this proposed project," said Associate Professor of Civil and Environmental Engineering Tom DiStefano, who is active in the citizen's group.

The proposed Giant Supermarket would be located on Route 15 by River Road on the right-hand side. According to McGinnis, it was proposed that a traffic light be installed at the bottom of the hill on River Road. McGinnis said this is of serious concern, especially on icy days.

"The developer for Giant did a traffic impact study by a consultant and the township had an engineering firm review the studies done," McGinnis said. "We are somewhat reproducing that study and expanding it. My students are looking at a broader area to see the secondary impacts."

Jeffrey Loss is a member of the Rural Route Neighbors, a group that opposes a Giant Supermarket at the proposed location. He believes the original study done on traffic safety was flawed.

"The original study only addressed Route 15, and it passed by the back roads leading to the [Giant site]."

Loss said that prior to the study by McGinnis' class, the Rural Route Neighbors had requested that additional studies be conducted. He said the class' study is exactly what the Rural Route Neighbors were looking for.

"How can you make a decision when you don't have complete information? The original study did not give adequate information to address the impact on township roads," Loss said.

DiStefano said it is certain that traffic volume would increase significantly on EBT roads as potential customers travel from west of the site to the proposed store.

"The Union County Planning Commission has informed EBT supervisors that it expects significant traffic impact on local roads and has recommended that necessary safety improvements to the roads be identified by the township engineer," DiStefano said. "A more comprehensive study is needed to determine if the local roads can handle the increased traffic, if improvements are needed, safety concerns and the cost of completed necessary improvements."

Seth Pollak '04 is a member of one of the groups studying the intersection on North Fourth Street and Route 15.

"There have actually been a few major accidents at the intersection, and many students go through it. It is important that we are donating our services to the town because it is unlikely that the town would pay a private engineering firm to do something like this. This is something we can do to give back," Pollak said.

McGinnis said the study previously done for Giant looked at the concept of the level of service.

"The grading of service goes from A to E, where A is the safest and E is the most congested. The projected analysis is to determine the level of traffic today compared to what it would be in the future," McGinnis said.

Aspects the students are looking at involve the sight distance for the proposed traffic light, as well as the assumption made in the original traffic study that relates to the direction people will come from to get to the Giant Supermarket. McGinnis said it was assumed that 45 percent of people would come north on Route 15, 45 percent would come from the south on Route 15, 5 percent would come from River Road and 5 percent would come from Beagle Club Road. The supermarket would be at the corner of Beagle Club Road and Route 15. He also said that many people jog and walk along Route 15, and that the safety of those people was not taken into account in the original study.

"We don't think the percentages are right according to where the population lives according to the 2000 U.S. Census data," McGinnis said. "It doesn't make sense that only half the people would come from the north."

Loss agreed that the percentages are incorrect.

"I agree with Professor McGinnis' assessment that if the numbers are flawed, then the results from the original study are flawed," Loss said. "What the numbers [in the original study] showed was that 5 percent of people would be coming into Giant from Beagle Club Road. Most people living in Lewisburg would be coming in from that way, and during peak hours, it is expected that 700 cars will visit Giant, which means only 35 of those cars would come in from Beagle Club Road. They are putting two entrances on Route 15 and one on Beagle Club Road, but if there are only 35 cars coming in there, why would they make an entrance on Beagle Club Road?"

McGinnis said his students are trying to be as fair as possible.

"We are not trying to fight Giant, we are trying to provide a study that shows what decision is best, and we are trying to analyze the data from an unbiased viewpoint," McGinnis said.

"How can you make a decision when you don't have complete information? The original study did not give adequate information to address to address the impact on township roads"

Peg Emery, custodian, dies at 59

Emery considered spirited and dedicated by students, staff

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

Bucknell lost an exceptional member of its custodial staff, Margaret Ann "Peg" Emery, on March 23, 2003. She was 59. Emery died at Geisinger Medical Center in Danville. She was employed by Bucknell for approximately two years and also cleaned private homes.

"She was a very hard worker. The students she had all cared for her and appreciated her work. And she was always there for the students that she cleaned for."

—Robert Snook, custodial section supervisor of the lower campus

Emery's colleagues, the students on the halls she cleaned and her bosses only thought the best of her.

"Peg was not with us very long but was a very dedicated cleaning professional. She took an exceptional amount of pride in the areas she worked in and was always looking for better ways to accomplish her assignments," Director of Facility Services Michael Patterson said.

Two years ago Emery was hired by the Bucknell Personnel Department to work in Smith Hall and Spratt House.

Eileen DeSantis, the assistant director of personnel was involved in hiring Emery. DeSantis said she was only involved with Emery from the hiring process and orientation, but she remembers finding Emery to be very pleasant and well-liked.

"Peg was well-recommended by the people whose private homes she cleaned before coming to Bucknell. I remember the people were sad to see Peg leave them and come to Bucknell because she was a great employee," DeSantis said.

Custodial Section Supervisor of the Lower Campus Roger Snook was Emery's immediate supervisor.

"She was a very hard worker. The students she had all cared for her and appreciated her work. And she was always there for the students that she cleaned for," Snook said.

Emery was the custodian on the hall in which Kim Cocoros '03 was a resident assistant last year in Smith.

"Peg was a very spirited woman. You could tell this by just being in a room with her. She's the kind of person with whom it is impossible to have a fake conversation. She was always very nice to me and my residents. Peg is really going to be missed in Smith. My residents this year were upset to hear the news, even though she is not the custodian in charge of my hall," Cocoros said.

According to Snook, Emery always paid close attention to the area she was concerned with cleaning.

"It is rare to find someone who is proud of their work like Peg was. She always paid close attention to detail," Snook said.

Snook said Emery was not just a good worker but also a good friend.

"A lot of times you get people who are just peers and coworkers, but Peg wanted to be a friend as well as a coworker," Snook said. "She was always concerned about people. She loved to sit and watch people."

One attribute that those who knew Emery agree on is that she was an individual.

"She was a very private person. Peg walked her own way and it made her the good person that she was. She never followed any cliques. She was a religious woman, a good Christian. While others would sit and eat together during lunchtime, she would be in a different location, content, and reading the Bible," Snook said.

Emery was well-liked among the custodial staff, personnel, the students and any other member of the University community with whom she came in contact.

Emery is survived by her mother, Sara Hulsizer, daughter Kathy Jo Renn and two grandchildren, Alexander and Briana. In addition, she leaves behind stepchildren, stepgrandchildren and even step-great-grandchildren. Peg also has a brother and three sisters.

"Peg was a very spirited woman. You could tell this by just being in a room with her. She's the kind of person with whom it is impossible to have a fake conversation."

Emery's funeral was held last Wednesday at the Shaw Funeral Home in Milton. She was buried in Milton Cemetery.

Kappa Sigma Fraternity elects to forfeit house

The brothers of the Kappa Sigma Fraternity have elected to forfeit their on-campus house. The fraternity could not meet the University's demand for higher membership numbers.

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

Kappa Sigma, a long-standing fraternity on campus, has recently elected to forfeit ownership of its house to the University. Kurt Christian Decker '04, president of Kappa Sigma, said that the primary reason for the decision was the University's demand for higher membership numbers.

"The brothers decided that we would rather enjoy the rest of the semester without the constant burden of recruiting more members in order to meet the University's ever-changing requirements. We can now worry about recruiting quality instead of quantity when it comes to new members," Decker said.

Kevin Lang '04 said the decision to forfeit ownership of the house was a choice they decided to make.

"We wanted to stick to our ideals of brotherhood," Lang said.

Lang believes that the brotherhood will only become stronger and more united because of the actions taken.

According to Decker, the fraternity is currently looking into renting a downtown house for next year.

"Depending on the University's policy and our national policy, our chapter meeting and select brotherhood events may need to be held on campus, but if that is not required, then we will be having them at our downtown house," Decker said.

The loss of a house can greatly impact the appeal of a fraternity to students that rush. Decker acknowledged that this would be an obvious disadvantage for Kappa Sigma, but the forfeit of ownership was crucial to maintaining the ideals of the fraternity.

"I do think that losing our house next year will impact our rush in the fall. But in obtaining a downtown house, we will still be able to keep a presence on campus and participate in rush like all other fraternities," Kappa Sigma brother Matt Keiser '05 said.

According to Keiser, rush will actually be better in many ways for Kappa Sigma because of a downtown presence. He said that the current first-year students know of their house on campus and learned who they were, both of which will be useful in the fall rush.

According to Decker, almost all the brothers and most recent alumni have also decided not to donate any money to the University in the future.

The overall impact that the forfeiture of their house will have on Kappa Sigma will only be seen in time. It is apparent that the brotherhood is determined to maintain a strong membership that exemplifies those ideals of which it is based.

International students express concerns and feelings on Operation Iraqi Freedom

By Jolene Hart
Senior Editor

What we have seen in the preceding months—apart from the fact that opinions on the current war are as passionate and as diverse as possible—is that Operation Iraqi Freedom is affecting the entire world.

People of the world are linked from the most fundamental levels of existence: our economies, our foreign policies, our histories and possibly even through our families, relatives or friends. As a result, citizens from all areas of the world, seek a forum for their opinions.

Have we taken the time to step back and reflect on our own position from the perspective of another, possibly helping us to concede, or at least acknowledge, the views of others?

An international perspective on the war with Iraq is something of which we have all been made acutely aware by following the actions of the United Nations and the current media coverage throughout the world, but the views of foreign citizens are available on campus through the eyes of international students.

It seems that war has the potential to unite as well as divide, and it is possible that we can learn much about ourselves from the experiences of those among us who see our country from this distinct perspective. Anyone who has traveled abroad can understand the important role that you take on when leaving your home country. Foreigners in the United States, as well as Americans abroad, have the potential to change others' views of their home countries, which are often dictated by media and lingering stereotypes.

Several of the University's international students gave The Bucknellian their perspectives on the war from the view of outsiders on the inside; the degrees to which they or their countries are personally involved vary as widely as their opinions. One thing is certain—giving attention to their words offers us a deeper understanding of ourselves.

Life in the United States

Overall, many students feel that their treatment at the University and within the United States has not changed significantly since the commencement of war.

Yusef Kudsi '06 is an economics major with Syrian parents, though he was raised in London.

"I have not been affected at all, but I do not look particularly Middle Eastern. Even if I did, I don't think it would pose any problems for me, at least not in Lewisburg. I have not noticed that Lewisburg is racially or politically charged enough to cause any problems for students from the region in question," Kudsi said.

Nicolas Willett '05, a civil engineer from France, agreed.

"Personally, the war has not affected me in any direct way, but I think that the image of America shared by the rest of the world is damaged in a short term," Willett said.

Benoist Gaudineau '04 is an American history major from Tours, France.

"I'm treated differently by the students, but I got the main negative response by the media. American students don't ostracize me for being French, and actually I have met many students agreeing on my country's position," Gaudineau said.

Suzanne Van Hulle '03, an international relations and Spanish major, lives in Geneva, Switzerland and is a Swiss, Irish and Belgian citizen.

In recent months, and especially following the military action in Iraq, many families of international students are more concerned for their safety.

Odd Hanssen '05 is an economics and international relations major from Ecuador.

"The war has affected my family somewhat, in that my closest relatives have become worried for my safety, for my immediate family's safety, due to my past and my brother's current attendance at an American international school," Hanssen said.

The world view

After hearing the opinions of several students, it is evident that many of their ideas reflect the same criticism and concerns that divide Americans. Like the views of many American students at the University, the opinions of international students are charged and controversial.

Hanssen: I believe that most of the people in my home country are not in favor of the war, for reasons such as general dislike of war, due to recently terminated conflicts of our own, support for the United Nations and hatred towards the United States. However, much of this sentiment is silent due to the fragile relations held with the United States, how my country is completely economically dependent upon the United States through its International Monetary Fund agreement and foreign debts, and how the government cannot afford an open opposition to the United States.

Gaudineau: French people … believe that the reason to attack Iraq is not the weapons but, on the contrary, the fact that they [Iraqis] don't have these weapons anymore and so they are an easier target than they were during the first Gulf War.

Kudsi: As for Syria and the Arab opinion, despite differences within the Arab world, I think they see it as a stab, direct or indirect at Arab nationalism and sovereignty. There is an old Arab saying: 'My brother and I will fight my cousin, my cousin and I will fight the stranger.' So here they are united in seeing the United States as the stranger trying to further its interests in the region, under the umbrella of what harm Saddam might cause in the future.

Van Hulle: The majority feel that something needed to be done. However, the sentiment towards the U.S. government is that of imperialists and neo-colonialists.

Hanssen: The people of the world are against this war because they are afraid; afraid that if a country, any country, can decide that this particular country is evil and 'needs a regime change,' and then goes ahead despite not obtaining U.N. support, that there is no knowing where that country will stop."

Learning from the past

Some students' home countries experienced military occupation in their recent histories and can offer a unique perspective on the effects of the war.

Gaudineau: Seventy-five percent of northern French cities were bombed by the Germans and the allies during World War II, and when bombs fall on you, it does not rejoice you to know they are from your liberators. When you visit a French city outside Paris, you will have a tiny part of the city called "the Old," the Old Tours or the Old Blois. That tiny part is the quarter which was not bombed during the war.

Van Hulle: The war in Iraq is not only causing many internal problems, but also in neighboring countries, which are upsetting and disregarded by most media sources….Switzerland is home for a large percentage of international citizens as well as to refugees. With the 1998 war in Kosovo, many Kosovars sought refuge in Geneva, Switzerland. Most of them found a job and all was well. However, the crime rate suddenly increased considerably, creating anti-refugee sentiments.

A different culture

Students remarked that, in general, only a few members of the University community sought their opinions on the war. Gaudineau said that University students asked about his feelings on the French view of the war and on "freedom fries," the name suggested to replace "French fries" by Ohio congressman Bob Ney.

Reflecting on the political involvement they have witnessed in the United States, students felt that the reactions to war or to a major political event are different when compared to the political interest in their home countries.

Hanssen: I would consider students my age [in Ecuador] at least more involved in politics in general than in the United States, if not for more than the university protests and demonstrations that disrupt or paralyze city life at least 10 times a year.

Gaudineau: People here have an opinion, or so, but I don't think they care at all. It's not just about world politics, but politics in general. Show your disinterest for politics and it will be the signal for the government to do whatever they want and not in the best interest of the people. I am not saying that young French people feel more concerned. In normal, quiet times, they don't. They don't vote so much. But if something very wrong is happening, it will wake them up and they will demonstrate in mass to show their disagreement.

Van Hulle: I have the feeling that the majority of students in Switzerland know the details concerning Iraq's history and current situation regardless of their area of study. I have the feeling that most students discuss the situation daily, among themselves and with their families.

Kudsi: I think British teen-agers are similar to their American counterparts, yet in the European continent they are more politically motivated, with France at the zenith.

Living in the present

Gaudineau and Van Hulle also expressed concern and criticism of United States media coverage, citing that the media in their home countries often gives a much broader perspective.

Van Hulle: Regardless of one's views on the war, we should all seek different news sources concerning the coverage with the war on Iraq. CNN is not the only news source."

Gaudineau: Having had the chance to compare the kind of information that French and European media give with the information channels like Fox News, MSNBC or even CNN, I realized that these information channels are just brainwashing people to make them accept a biased point of view. If I had an advice for my Bucknell friends, it would be to watch, but carefully, the news and find other sources to complete and have a better view of the war. Go to the BBC Web site, Reuters, or if you speak Spanish, French or German, the main newspapers there."

Hanssen: I have considered leaving the country a few times, and see less of a future working in the United States.

Gaudineau: Actually, I don't know what it is going to mean for my future in America. Some of my friends in France asked for a visa for an internship in the United States, and they did not get it. If I want to visit my friends at Bucknell next September or if I want to go to a graduate school here, will I be accepted? I don't know.

Looking toward the future

The war in Iraq, affecting our lives on many different levels, leaves these us all with very different opinions. The current situation clearly has the potential to change the previous feelings of these students.

Gaudineau: It [the onset of war] did not affect my opinions of America and American people. I have not become anti-American. You cannot condemn a people for what its government is doing.

Willett: France has had a long history of confronting the United States but I don't feel obliged towards either country. I agree with France's decision to stay out of the war only because I don't have enough true information to adequately judge the situation in Iraq. What I am sure of is that Saddam Hussein is an awful leader that has driven his country into poverty and pain and that he should be removed. Is war the best way to go about this? It surely is the quickest, most short-term effective.

Kudsi: As an Arab I sympathize greatly with Iraqi people … but I do see the greater good here, and I hope the United States carries out its stated intentions of installing a stable, independent, and somewhat democratic regime.

University helps students cope with war

Administrators, deans, chaplains and counselors anticipating of student needs

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

The University administration and campus groups have been putting together programs and services to help students cope with any fear or sorrow they may be experiencing due to the current conflict in Iraq.

According to University Chaplain Ian Oliver, as soon as fighting began, a meeting was held in which he discussed with Deans of Students Amy Badal and Richard Ferraro, Jewish Chaplain Serena Fujita, Director of Psychological Services Arlene Hoyt, Catholic Chaplain Martin O. Moran and Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 what should be done for students. Oliver said a variety of services have been and will be available for students.

Ferraro said he is surprised at how calm students' reactions to the Iraqi conflict have been.

"I am so impressed with the degree of civility during demonstrations. People are both thoughtful and polite and I see no insensitivity," Ferraro said. "People seem remarkably self-composed in contrast with [how they felt] after Sept. 11."

Associate Director of Psychological Services Rosaria Gabriele said she has not encountered many students whose primary concern was the Iraqi conflict.

"It does not seem that students are coming in with the war being a specific issue for them, but rather feeling stressed because of many things—academics usually the first—and some feeling sadness and compassion about the victims of the war," Gabriele said.

Pollock said that, as of now, the administration has decided that things should remain "business as usual."

"It hasn't reached a point to interrupt that, to turn full attention to the matter," Pollock said.

Oliver said that the compilation of previous events from the past year and the current conflict have made students more stressed.

"It has been a tough year at Bucknell," Oliver said. "There have been a lot of deaths, more so than ever, which had a large effect on everyone. Also, the anniversary of Sept. 11 kept people on edge. People's fuses are just a little shorter, and that can build up."

Associate Director of Psychological Services Eric Affsprung said that the Psychological Services Center will continue to provide support for students.

"Of course, if something extraordinary should happen, another attack upon our soil for example, our office, as well as the entire student affairs staff, will seek to do whatever we can to provide additional support to the student community," Affsprung said.

Oliver said that it is hard to know exactly what to do for students without making matters worse.

"On the academic side, we are trying to make things more helpful than hurtful through things such as discussion. It is difficult to come up with a helpful response," Oliver said. "We don't want to over or under respond to students."

Religious and other campus groups have held events in the past two weeks. A peace vigil and interfaith service was held on Monday outside Freas Hall and the Conservatives Club held a rally last Friday on the uphill Langone Center (LC) lawn to support the American troops in Iraq.

"On the academic side, we are trying to make things more helpful than hurtful through things such as discussion. It is difficult to come up with a helpful response.…We don't want to over or under respond to students."
—Ian Oliver, University chaplain*

"We've gotten word out to RAs that they can request programs. We encourage to have educational programs and coping programs," Pollock said.

Psychological Services also offers a support group for students to gather together and to share their feelings about Operation Iraqi Freedom. The first of these meetings was held Wednesday in the LC.

"Speaking only for myself, I have not had many students coming in wanting to talk about the war," Affsprung said. "After Sept. 11, however, a number of students, especially seniors, expressed anxiety about the future, about moving far away from family and about living in working in a major urban area like New York City."

Ferraro said that the administration is trying to be as responsive to student needs as possible.

"Deans will stay late or come in early, but we are getting the feeling that students are handling things well. However, that could change because war is fluid and we will try to provide all the assistance possible," Ferraro said.

According to Ferraro, if students want to have a discussion group or forum, the Deans of Students would be "more than happy to do that."

Moran has gathered names of relatives, friends and acquaintances of students who are currently a part of the war. This list is posted in the LC.

"We are pretty much letting students who have family members and loved ones in harm's way self-identify. We are not going into students' records to determine that," Pollock said.

Instead, the University staff is encouraging students to discuss their reactions to the conflict.

"My advice for students right now would be to take a break from the war. Sitting in front of the television for hours will not make matters better," Oliver said. "Talk to someone. Don't be afraid not to have an opinion."

How long do you think the conflict will last?

Community participates in rally supporting U.S. troops

BUCC organizes outdoor event in response to peace vigils

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Clad in homemade T-shirts, bearing signs and waving flags, members of the Bucknell University Conservatives Club (BUCC), joined by additional students, staff and local community members, rallied in support of the U.S. troops March 28.

The demonstration began at 11:45 a.m. outside the uphill doors of the Langone Center (LC), the site of past peace rallies held by Bucknellians for Peace.

"I'm tired of seeing everyone protesting the troops. Someone has to be out here supporting them," Milton resident Mary Brouse said.

This rally was held largely in response to these previous peace vigils, Vice President of BUCC Charles Mitchell '05 said, though this was not the sole reason that the club organized the patriotic display.

"Some people [in BUCC] wanted to do it regardless," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said he has read a lot about the Vietnam War. He said that when the troops returned to the United States after the war, protesters spat on them.

Anti-war and anti-troop protests hurt the morale of the soldiers in Vietnam and Mitchell did not want history to repeat itself.

"Soldiers do as they are told; they don't make policies. You can disagree with [U.S. President] George W. Bush vehemently, but don't disrespect the troops," Mitchell said.

A debate was to be held between the BUCC and the Bucknellians for Peace, but it was called off once the war began.

At least one member of Bucknellians for Peace was reported to have attended the rally to support the troops, regardless of his views on the war itself.

Patriotic music played in the background as those present held various signs reading: "It's not all about oil," "If Saddam's Not a Threat, Which City Are You Willing to Wager," "War Ended Fascism, Slavery and Nazism" and "Make Love After War," in addition to others.

Yellow and red, white and blue ribbons were distributed at the rally. The ribbons were purchased with money received from subscriptions to BUCC's publication, The Counterweight.

Prior to the demonstration, BUCC sent out press releases to several local newspapers notifying them of the event. A campus-wide e-mail also circulated to notify students and faculty.

At its peak, shortly after noon, there were an estimated 60 people lined up outside the LC.

Wearing a camouflage T-shirt and holding a sign, Emily Rokicki '05 said that the display was intended "to show that there are lots of people here at Bucknell that actually care."

Mitchell described the success of the rally as "amazing."

"We were really, really pleased with how many people from our support staff came," Mitchell said.

Mailroom employees and Terrace Room staff were among those demonstrating their support.

The pro-troops rally received front-page coverage of many local newspapers including Sunbury Daily Item, Lewisburg Daily Journal and Williamsport Sun-Gazette.

"I hope that they all [the troops] hear that there were 60 people at Bucknell that were strongly behind them," Martin Wade '06 said.

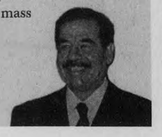
Hussein's reign prompts mainly disdain...

After gaining independence from Great Britain in 1932, Iraq has been a key component in the Middle East picture. Saddam Hussein's reign has been marked by bloodshed and controversy, from the lucrative oil fields, the repeated attacks against the Kurdish people in Iraq, to the concern over the presence of weapons of mass destruction.



■ April 28, 1937
Saddam Hussein is born in Tikrit, Iraq, and soon sent to live with his maternal uncle. During his early years, reports have linked Saddam to the murders of a school teacher and/or a cousin.

■ 1959
Hussein attempts to assassinate the Prime Minister of Iraq. He is arrested for six months.

■ February 6, 1963
Hussein returns to Iraq after the Ramadan Revolution and is elected to the Baath Party.

■ February 8, 1963
President Qasim is ousted in a coup led by the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party. Six months of chaos follow, prompting another military coup.

In 1980, Hussein's first foreign policy move as president of Iraq was to seize the oil fields in Iran (pictured right). His initial push was successful, but he ultimately needed outside help to win the war.

■ February 25, 1960
After being convicted for his assassination attempt, Hussein traveled to Syria and then Egypt to escape a death sentence.

■ November 18, 1963
The Ba'ath government is overthrown by Arif and a group of military officers; 5000-6000 Iraqis are executed in backlash against communism.

■ July, 1968
Hussein participates in a coup to overthrow Iraq's president and the regime.

■ July 16, 1979
Hussein compelled President Bakr to resign on 'health grounds.' Hussein is elected as the president of Iraq, Chairman of Revolution Command Council and secretary general of the Ba'ath party.

Campus community reacts

"Coming from a tradition that teaches 'if anyone destroys a human soul, it is as if that person had destroyed an entire world.' (Sanhedrin 37:a), the whole idea of war is very disturbing. My son's best friend, whom we have known since he was 4 years old, is in the Marines, so my family is directly affected by the war. But even beyond knowing someone personally, it is all of the thousands of people who will experience loss and disruption of their lives that I think about constantly. I worry that this war will further demonize the United States in the eyes of many in the world. I worry that the United States is on a course that will lead to involvement in countries that we have no right to be involved in, while using money for weapons that we could use to help the poor and the needy. When do we focus on our needs? I worry who is going to pick up the pieces at home."
—Serena Fujita, Jewish chaplain

"I cannot tell you how sorry I am that young soldiers and civilians of all ages are being maimed, wounded, killed, because a diplomatic solution was possible, because the claim to the forces now being 'coalition' is visibly empty, because anti-Americanism is on the rise all over the world, which saddens me, and because I believe the current violence will spawn more, rather than less, terrorism. But I think it's important to remember that both pro-war and pro-peace movements have a similar goal: a safer world. Now that we have gone in one direction rather than the other, only time will tell whether the world will be more secure. The act of invading another country with the stated purpose of assassinating its leader is a fateful act of aggression, and it has been reported around the world, often without the administration's idealizing rhetoric used here to justify it. That bald fact, shorn of idealizing rationales, has surely shocked and awed many in the world."
—Cynthia Hogue, associate professor of English

"I don't have any family members or friends in the military, but the war is having a profound personal effect on me. For one thing, I very often cry when I listen to the news. I cry for the dead, the wounded, the bereft and grieving; the missing, the frightened, the desperate, for everyone involved in this war and for their families and for the horrible waste of resources that this war entails. I look at the pictures of civilians and soldiers and grieve for the suffering of both. I've held protest signs for the first time in my life, I've spoken out a lot, and I've listened a lot, trying to stay open to all viewpoints and sympathetic to the concerns behind those viewpoints. I'm very sad and very tired. From what I've been able to see, the war is affecting individuals and some groups, but I don't see it affecting Bucknell as an institution yet. I think it will, once the economic effects of this war start being felt."
—Sabrina Kirby, writing and teaching consultant

"I guess what I would say about this war is that one can hate the sin and love the sinner; we can vehemently oppose this war and still support those who are fighting it. Those of us who lived through the Vietnam era remember that among the myriad of mistakes that were made, one particularly egregious infraction was that made against the soldiers themselves, who were tormented or shunned or otherwise damned for doing what our government asked them to do. I am relieved to see and hear that we have learned from that mistake, and even the protestors of this war express support for our troops. That is a very important distinction that needs to be made."
—Candace Hinckley, library technical assistant

"I have realized how much I love my country and her true allies—Britain and Australia in particular."
—Corey Langer '06

"One of my good friends is a Marine sargeant. I have to check the casualties list every day to see if he's still alive. It's pretty sobering."

"The war is affecting me by revealing to me we are not living in democracy. We can say no, our government does not care at all (except if you are French). We are living in temporary monarchy, where the king listens to his subjects when it is time for him to be re-elected as king. The only thing that matters to them is not the people but the sake of the companies financing the electoral campaign. Our governments are defending their interests, not ours. They don't care about ours. It affects me because I realized we are still living in the 20th century, in the third, fourth decade of that century, where everything is lies, propaganda, from the government and the media. It affects me because I am French, and for defending a position shared by 80 percent of the world population, my country got ostracized, spat on and was used as a scapegoat by media which have sold their journalistic integrity for the money which will come from a war coverage."

"Personally, I have struggled with my thoughts and feelings about the war, but it was still just a TV phenomenon for me until I heard from Matt Hopkins, Class of 2000, who was shipping out 10 days ago to the Gulf with the Army. Knowing a former student from Bucknell who might be one of those figures on grainy satellite phone pictures from Iraq on the news made me watch those images differently. It was no longer a geo-political game or just a political problem—suddenly someone from here was there, and it made it all seem more real, and more frightening. I think the war has affected everyone's emotional state, even (or perhaps especially) those who don't think it has. People seem tense, more likely to get angry, more likely to cry. What were fairly reasonable discussions about the advisability or morality of the war before it began are now shouting matches. For people who already have major worries, the war seems to be pushing them to the edge of meltdown. I worry about the last month of school, as we hit what is always a crazy time at Bucknell anyway."

"Although England is our ally in the war, most people still tend to be against the war, and many people also believe that all Americans are for the war, or at least are very knowledgeable and interested in discussing it. It is even more important to keep a low profile as an American based on the war, and I have seen protests in every city I have been in."
—Lacy Gonzalez '04, studying abroad in Bath, England

"Being abroad, especially in a country where the government and the majority of the people oppose the war, has made me more cautious and less vocal about being an American. I get asked every time I go out, from people that I've never met, if I am for or against the war. I answer by asking them what their opinions are on the war and then discuss their ideas with them. I am here to learn, not to teach. Contrary to what many Americans think, the rest of the world has a lot to teach us. The French people have nothing wrong with the American people, but many do find fault with the current American administration, as many Americans do as well. The belief that the French hate Americans, and vise versa, has been dreamt up and compounded by the media who have created a sort of xenophobia on both sides."

"There are times to be silent and times to speak. This is a time to speak. The accumulated costs of the Vietnam war are not in men and material alone. There are costs too in the effects on young people's hopes aid beliefs.

"Like ourselves, the vast majority of the students with whom we work still want to believe in a just, honest and sensitive America. But our military engagement in Vietnam now stands as a denial of so much that is best in our society.

"More and more, we see the war deflecting energies and resources from urgent business on our own doorsteps. An end to the war will not solve the problems on or off the campus. It will however permit us to work more effectively in support of more peaceful priorities.

"Far from being depressed about our nation's future and our institution's future, we see bold opportunities ahead once the decisiveness of this war is in the past.

"We urge upon the President of the United States and upon Congress a stepped-up timetable for withdrawal from Vietnam. We believe this to be in our country's highest interest, at home and abroad."

"We speak as individuals who work with young men and women. The universities and colleges which we serve take no position as institutions on the Vietnam War; these are pluralistic communities where men speak for themselves alone on off-campus issues. Like ourselves, the vast majority of the students with whom we work still want to believe in a just, honest and sensitive America. But our military engagement in Vietnam now stands as a denial of so much that is best in our society ..."

ROTC Presentation Progresses Despite Demonstrators' Protest

By ED MARSTON

The ROTC President's Review, at which 22 cadets received awards for meritous service, went on as planned Saturday while about 200 demonstrators lined the Memorial Stadium field, protesting against ROTC on campus and the Vietnam war. There was no interruption of the ceremonies.

Other awards recognizing outstanding cadets in the fields of scholarship and leadership were presented to the following cadets in the senior class: Richard Dunn, Charles Goldman III, David McKinnon Lawrence Wood, Frank Arentowicz, Robert Cheek, Hea... Fuller, and Hol...

ROTC cadets throughout the protest. Some hissed when the demonstrators first marched onto the field. Shouts of "Get off the field, pigs!" were heard.

The announcement that this was the senior cadets' "last performance before graduation" brought laughter and applause from the protesters assembled on the field.

At one point a demonstrator, Jim Fuss, ran through the ROTC ranks, doing handsprings. Fuss said "... This act is a celebration of life. Everybody here seems to be celebrating death. . .clapping for the cards."

As the protesting group moved on the field, Ron Taylor, one of the demonstrators, was threatened by an unidentified man in a blue suit who said, "I'll be looking for your ass. . .You'll have your peace."

In a meeting with the administration on Friday, permission was given to the demonstrators to be behind the goal post at the north end of the stadium, providing their actions were "not disruptive." Alan Shulman explained this to the group before the review began and told them to decide for themselves how the protest would be conducted. Several demonstrators went on the field and marched through the ROTC ranks.

An unidentified student onlooker said, ". . .They had no right to disrupt the ROTC ceremony. It's an infringement. . .these are the same people who complain of infringement of their rights. If they'd protested afterwards, that's fine."

Flashback to Vietnam

A look at Bucknell during the war

By RACHEL LASKOW
Senior Editor

The last of American forces left Vietnam on March 29, 1973. Now, 30 years later, American troops are just beginning their invasion of Iraq in an attempt to disarm Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. In both situations, the war greatly affected the University and created challenges as well as learning opportunities.

Retired Professor of Psychology Douglas Candland came to the University in 1960, a few years before the Vietnam War started.

"[The war] came on slowly. It began as the war with Iraq has begun, with promises that it wouldn't last long," Candland said.

One of the major differences between the Vietnam War and Operation Iraqi Freedom is that male students could be drafted during the Vietnam War.

"The draft was out there waiting for many of us, and it was determined by a lottery draw whether or not we would be chosen, and all our lives we had been raised to believe in and follow our elders," Jim Ball '71 said.

Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 remembers that the draft caused a lot anxiety because students were concerned about friends and loved ones who were subject to the draft.

Many University students expressed their opinions about the draft. According to a Nov. 18, 1969 Bucknellian article, moratorium supporters planted crosses, bearing the names of all male University seniors eligible for the draft, in the academic quad.

Bill Niklas, campus coordinator of the moratorium, said that the purpose of the crosses was not to condemn anyone, but rather to encourage discussion on the issue.

"In fact, it must have shaken some people out of their apathetic or silent existences, for it encouraged discussion. That was the purpose of the cross-planting, and if only one or two students have decided to continue voicing their opinions so that all might hear, then it was, in my opinion, worthwhile," Niklas said in The Bucknellian article.

Similar to Niklas' feelings, Ball remembers hearing the word "apathetic" a lot on campus. According to Ball, while there was clearly a general apathy at the time, most people knew what was going on in Southeast Asia and some of them were active in raising awareness.

"I think that the apathy was a result of a feeling of helplessness on the part of young people at the time to do anything to impact their fate," Ball said.

Ball said that it was very easy not to pay a lot of attention to the war because the University is removed from everything else.

Both Ball and Pollock remember the late '60s and early '70s as a fairly quiet time at the University.

"The war was going on when we came and left. The background noise was there, but it didn't ruin your life," Ball said.

For the most part, noise was created from differences in opinions, which led to protests and rallies.

"There was some intramural confrontation between supporters and those in opposition to the war, but not a great deal," Pollock said.

Pollock remembers some hostility towards ROTC. On May 10, 1969, about 200 demonstrators lined the Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium field during the ROTC President's Review, a ceremony at which 22 cadets received merit awards their services. According to the May 14, 1969 Bucknellian, 100 demonstrators marched onto the field during the review and held signs that said "ROTC trains men to kill liberally" and "ROTC must be removed."

Throughout the war, many events occurred that greatly affected the nation. On May 4, 1970, Ohio National Guardsmen killed four students and wounded nine others at Kent State University, an event known as the Kent State killings. Candland, Ball and Pollock agree that the Kent State killings sparked activity and concern on campus.

"The most dramatic moment was the Kent State killings," Candland said.

Pollock admits that the war was a very angry time, but he also recognizes the fact that people at Bucknell managed their anger better than people elsewhere.

"There was a great deal of anger. Anger the war was being fought with apparent disregard for the will of the people. Anger over attempts to crush dissent," Pollock said.

Despite the mixed feelings of students, the University tried to use the world situation as a learning experience, just as it is doing with the current conflict with Iraq.

"During Vietnam, opportunities were taken to make the war a teachable moment and to help people understand the dynamics at the root of the conflict, and I see the University doing that now and applaud it," Pollock said.

Now, University officials are encouraging professors to take time out of their classes to discuss the war. Similarly, Ball recalls having a history professor who was vocal about the situation.

Despite the importance and urgency of the situation, Candland never felt it was appropriate to discuss politics in the classroom. He did meet with students individually to discuss concerns.

"I don't think a professor's job is to indoctrinate," Candland said.

In fact, the Vietnam War had such an impact on the education at the University that the faculty voted on May 4, 1970 to support the concerns of the student body regarding the Southeast Asian situation and to suspend normal University operations, including regularly-scheduled classes for four days, according to the May 5, 1970 Bucknellian.

"Probably we are at a more difficult passage than we have ever been before," late University President Charles Watts said at the conclusion of the debate.

Watts also saw the war as an opportunity to join other institutions across the nation and voice their opinions.

In the fall of 1969 Watts signed a statement, along with presidents of 78 other private colleges and universities, which was sent to the late U.S. President Richard Nixon. The letter appealed for a "stepped-up timetable for withdrawal in Vietnam." The letter emphasized the fact that the presidents were speaking as individuals and not on behalf of their institutions.

Despite difficulties, Watts found a way to help the University survive the war.

"President Watts was asked some years later why he thought Bucknell got through that tumultuous period without violence. The question was, 'What was Bucknell's secret?' and he answered, 'We talked, and we talked, and we talked,'" Pollock said.

Currently, the University is attempting to go about business as usual. According to Pollock, he does not believe there is as much personal investment as there was then.

"What I've observed so far has been a low-key response. It has not yet been front-page news in The Bucknellian. There have been rallies, but they have been fairly subdued," Pollock said.

"President Watts was asked some years later why he thought Bucknell got through that tumultuous period without violence. The question was, 'What was Bucknell's secret?' and he answered, 'We talked, and we talked, and we talked.'"

POLITICS

Apathy . . . of Course

By MIKE GUIER

You and I, all of us, are hypocrites.

When the term "Silent Majority" is mentioned, we snicker, and images appear in our minds of sheep being led to the slaughterhouse. "Ignorant" we call those men and women struggling to make enough money to send their kids to college. "Affluent snobs" we call them. Materialistic . . . They don't have time to read a newspaper or a good book, but they "find" the time to watch a TV soap-opera or third-rate movie. About current events, most of them know practically nothing. Some of them vote, often showing their ignorance, and their votes determine our government officials.

It's true, and we should do something about it. But how can we expect to be taken seriously? Are we so much better? Are we such model citizens?

Many of us support the extension of voting rights to eighteen-year-olds. We point to the interest and activity of youth today, but can we be sure of that? Consider the most recent campus elections; there was no evidence of real student interest. The turnout was declared greater than in previous elections, and the placing of ballot boxes in fraternity houses was the reason cited. It seems that our student body has to be "encouraged" to vote.

Many of us don't vote, seldom participate in constructive extra-curricular activities, and, worst of all, don't CARE. At least if we do care, it isn't obvious. Again I ask, "Are we so much better than the notorious Silent Majority?"

Apathy is perhaps America's greatest problem today. Students across the nation gripe about their country's faults, but few are really working to help find solutions to our problems.

A few years ago, poverty was finally recognized as a major problem; we declared war on poverty. That war has not been won yet, but at least some effort is being made. Maybe now the people, especially students, of this nation, not the government, should declare war on apathy, a major foe of all democratic and humanitarian ideals.

Moratorium

This past weekend many people once again involved themselves in discussion about and demonstrations against the war in Vietnam. The activities centered around two distinct organizational efforts: The Moratorium and the New York March on Washington.

MORATORIUM

Locally

In Lewisburg, several events to promote more community discussion were planned by the Bucknell Moratorium, co-ordinated by Bill Hann, arrangements had been made with the churches for faculty to spend an evening with the local people. Presently, the proposed experimental pass/fail proposal for academic credit is in the committee of academic affairs. It was passed, but not without considerable debate. The first problem was in trying to decide what is passing when it comes to pass/fail.

Dr. Robert E. Shanabar, chairman of the chemical engineering department, questioned whether a grade of 'C', or 'D', should be the cutoff for a pass. He felt that since a 'C' average was required to graduate, a 'C' should be the lowest passable, a 'C' should be the lowest passing grade.

After much discussion, Dr. Alan I. Leshner, assistant professor of psychology, made the point, "what is a passing grade is up to the individual professor anyway, so the discussion is irrelevant." The point was dropped.

At this point the final two parts of the proposal, to have pass/fail seminars, and to make it possible for any department to present a pass/fail proposal to the faculty for consideration, was passed.

The Faculty, in an effort, reinstituted with the student body that it is concerned with issues most important to students. Those faculty members who devoted class time to discussion about the war also performed a valuable service to the students.

The Moratorium Committee also provided other activities for University involvement. There was a showing of the anti-war film "The War Game" Thursday, a Service for Peace Thursday night and poorly attended throughout the Moratorium, workshops in the Quad on how to make up armbands and mock funerals for deployment in the Quad, a concept for the classroom discussion of issues books about Vietnam, attention turned toward Washington.

MARCH ON WASHINGTON

Despite last minute efforts by local officials to discredit the March and create an unwelcome atmosphere in Washington, the New Mobe organized the largest demonstration in District's history. The Justice Department's attempt to establish nationals mood of potential violence so as to deter would-be participants from attending proved unsuccessful and embarrassing. An estimated total of ¾ of a million people marched in Washington on Thursday to Saturday expressing their desires for "immediate total withdrawal from Vietnam."

Small bands of militants instigated violence, but they were upstaged by the overwhelming majority of peaceful demonstrators. The restraint shown by the authorities and the marchers is a tribute to the individuals involved in the effort.

And the War goes on . . .

University Faculty Suspends Classes

By KEN WERNICK and ROBERT WENDEL

The faculty voted yesterday to support the concern of the student body regarding the Southeast Asian situation and to suspend normal University operations, including regularly - scheduled classes, thru

The University faculty approved yesterday, by a vote of for and 26 against, the following resolution pertaining to the University strike. The statement was prepared by Dr. Cleon Chenoweth, professor of political science. It stated:

"In view of recent decisions by President Nixon to broaden and widen the war in Southeast Asia; and whereas division and polarization over the war is intensely prejudicial to our national priorities including the vital purposes of higher education; and whereas concern over the war and its impact at homes and in the classrooms as well as in the streets as well as in the libraries and scholars;

it resolved that the faculty accept the concern of the student students as expressed in the slogan "On strike, open up and keep it open," and be further resolve to suspend normal university operations, including regularly scheduled classes, between May

Saturday by a vote of 91-54.

The motion was presented by Dr. Cleon Chenoweth, professor and chairman of the department of political science.

The faculty set a University precedent in its action formally criticizing the policies of a United States President.

Debate centered on the implications of the faculty's taking a position on a political issue. Dr. Jerome J. Hanus, assistant professor of business, stated "America has reached a moral crisis", and suggested support of the resolution.

Arguing against the resolution, Dr. David Lu, professor of history, considered the political role of a professional concern for the world-wide situation by saying, "Probably we are at a more difficult passage than we have ever been at before."

Student initiative influenced the faculty in passing the resolution, according to Chenoweth. He said, "The silence of the quad made us realize the importance with which the community viewed the situation."

William Cooper, professor of economics, said, "We've encouraged them (the students) to think the fruits of this. . . We are on trial today."

Chenoweth, in an interview with The Bucknellian, stressed that "we must examine why we exist as a University. Most colleges were founded by religious groups, looking for a way to make education relevant to people in everyday life."

He continued, "By its action today the University is telling the world that it is concerned with the war. The purpose will be political, but we would be political by remaining silent. Most importantly, by holding various alternatives" The next order of business was the proposed experimental pass/fail proposal. The entire motion of the committee of academic affairs was passed, but not without considerable debate. The first problem was in trying to decide what is passing when it comes to pass/fail.

Dr. Robert E. Shanabar, chairman of the chemical engineering department, questioned whether a grade of 'C', or 'D', should be the cutoff for a pass. He felt that since a 'C' average was required to graduate, a 'C' should be the lowest passable, a 'C' should be the lowest passing grade.

Students well-educated about Operation Iraqi Freedom

The results of a Bucknellian survey on Operation Iraqi Freedom indicated that 48 percent of the student body supports U.S. intervention in Iraq, while 31 percent are against the conflict. Additionally, 88 percent of the student body can identify the United States' purpose in Iraq.

The Bucknellian finds it very encouraging that the student body has engaged itself in both forming opinions about the Iraqi conflict and also educating itself about the various issues surrounding the war.

This is particularly significant considering the televised media coverage of Operation Iraqi Freedom. The conflict has been sensationalized to the point that viewers can no longer distinguish war programming from "Survivor," "Big Brother" or any other reality show.

A member of the Editorial Board claimed to overhear students leaving the Bison—presumably on their way back to their dorm to watch television—talking about watching the United States "blow stuff up."

This reaction to coverage of the bombings of Iraq is a result of the sensationalized televised coverage of the war. Viewers are treated to a play-by-play of U.S. actions and on-the-field reporting that is more comparable to a sporting event than an armed conflict.

Fortunately, the results of the survey indicate that University students are still actively searching for complete, nonbiased information and are relying on other sources, such as Web sites and newspapers, for this more accurate coverage of the conflict.

The impersonal and around-the-clock network coverage has failed to address some of the ethical implications and real-world effects, causing a sense of detachment from the war.

According to Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, students have not been taking advantage of the many services set up by the administration, nor have they approached Psychological Services to discuss the Iraqi conflict.

The Bucknellian feels that this is largely due to the fact that the campus—although well-educated about the war—has not yet felt the emotional burden of the war, partially due to the televised media coverage.

During the Vietnam War, communities throughout the United States actively protested the war, staging rallies that often, unfortunately, ended in violence. Operation Iraqi Freedom has not resulted in the same emotional response.

Perhaps it is the lack of the draft or the fact that there have been few American casualties so far that have resulted in a less emotional response on campus.

It also may be that the sensationalized media and the alienation caused by it leaves students feeling detached and separate from the conflict.

Still, detachment does not mean that students are apathetic, nor does it preclude them from holding strong and differing opinions. In working and researching this issue over the past week, The Bucknellian has learned that not acting on an opinion is certainly distinct from apathy or not having opinion.

Deans' conduct is arbitrary and unprofessional

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

For students that have dealt with the deans to any significant degree, it's hardly unreasonable to label their actions as arbitrary. Such was the case this latest House Party Weekend, when the deans held an "emergency meeting" in which they determined that Delta Upsilon Fraternity (DU) was unfit to host its planned weekend events.

This story traces back to the beginning of the semester when DU got into some trouble for a few varying offenses. In order to have House Party, DU was told it would have to do a few particular things; this was agreed upon, and the DU brothers were mandated to clean the campus at 9 a.m. on both Saturday and Sunday morning as well as, predictably, pay a hefty fine.

All was seemingly well and good, or so it seemed. Herb Lohmann '04, president of DU, said, "I was in and out of the deans' office all week dealing with House Party-related activities, but they never even mentioned that they were considering such a decision." Invariably, it came as quite a surprise when, on the day before House Party, Herb was informed that the deans had decided during their "emergency meeting" to disallow DU from hosting its planned events. The deans said that this was the result of the accumulation of violations and sanctions.

While they had previously been led to believe they would be able to host the weekend without any problem—including being able to register all of their events and receive wristbands—the deans then had a change of heart, which was brought on by three incidents that had occurred that week. The incidents were as such: two DU brothers getting in trouble for smoking marijuana, an apparent unregistered party and unruly DU fans at the March 22 lacrosse game.

Smoking marijuana is obviously not a kosher activity with our school, but the appropriateness of an entire fraternity being brought down by the actions of only a couple individuals seems dubious. From my earliest recollections here, it has never been the way the rules work. The administration dropped this policy when, in an eerily similar incident that occurred last year. Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity (KDR), of which I am a member, was also told the day before House Party that the $7,000 it had already put toward the weekend would be going down the drain, as its events had all been canceled. During that instance, the decision was arrived at after one KDR brother was similarly caught smoking marijuana.

The second supposed incident begs a brief tangent. I recently had the opportunity to meet our new dean of Greek life, Lewis Marrara. I was attempting to rent a flatbed truck for KDR's Saturday afternoon outdoor party, on which a band would perform. I was told that I needed Marrara's signature in order to acquire it. I introduced myself and then explained the situation; he told me that I was a day too late, and it had to be done the week prior, per Physical Plant guidelines. Having worked with the Physical Plant in the past, knowing them to be nice and accommodating people, I asked that if they happen to grant me an exception—as it was still almost a week before the event—would he then give me the needed signature. He very surprisingly asserted that he would never do that, even if it was OK with every party involved. He also adopted a hostile attitude early on into the exchange, which I felt to be unbecoming and certainly unprovoked.

The second incident came about after Marrara felt it appropriate to enter DU's basement Saturday afternoon, camera-in-tow, and photograph beer cans on the floor. From this "evidence" he made the judgment—from his one or two months experience as dean of Greek life—to determine that the night prior DU held an unregistered party. This was in fact quite false, laughably at that.

"The motivation for Marrara to randomly come into our basement, and only ours, seems to be somewhat suspect," Nate Streets '03 said.

The third and final incident was probably the biggest stretch. DU was told that one of the reasons the deans had suddenly decided to disallow it from partaking in House Party was because it had unruly fans at the lacrosse game that Saturday. First and foremost: If our school wants students to actually attend our athletic events, they should encourage such spirited, rowdy fan participation, not punish it. Secondly, and as is the case with the two aforementioned incidents, no charges were ever brought upon the fraternity. No one at the game was specifically cited, and when details were sought by the brotherhood, none were provided.

Even though the deans had entirely abandoned the normal judicial process from the get-go, DU was still afforded an appeal, which it took advantage of. There was another emergency meeting held Thursday night, this time with the brotherhood and Dean of Students Richard Ferraro. Marrara perplexingly refused to speak with the brothers. They gave Ferraro the appeal and were told they would get a response by noon the next day. By 2 p.m. the next day, no response had come, so Herb went to the deans' office to speak with Marrara. Again, Marrara refused to talk. Instead, Ferraro informed them that there appeal had been denied.

There are several troubling aspects to this situation. For one, waiting until the day before House Party to inform a fraternity that its $3,000-plus investment would be going down the poop pipes reeks of certain unprofessional situation handling. When Nate Streets asked how they had the authority to override the Council On Greek Life, the normal Greek judicial system, they received an answer to the effect of, "because we're deans." Also troubling was the arbitrary nature of the decision. Two other fraternities had actual and significant violations the week prior to House Party, where charges were actually filed, yet their houses met dissimilar fates.

A dean of Greek life who is unwilling to meet with the chapter in question, takes unusual steps to allocate "evidence" to bolster his reasoning for an atypical act of authority and who feels comfortable superseding the previously-set standards for judicial actions in only his first few months of the job, is certainly making quite the statement about his intended forthcoming role here.

Catalyst article explained

To the Editor:

This is in response to Aaron Hanlon's article "Catalyst editorial decisions questioned" wherein he critiques my article in The Catalyst. I was grateful for his discussion of former U.S. President Bill Clinton's politics, but dismayed that my feminist analysis of war and sex was overlooked, even ignored. I'm not surprised when the larger point of feminism is lost from any text that discusses sexual acts, but I find it inappropriate for Hanlon to declare the article is "careless" while neglecting its main theme in his analysis.

Hanlon does provide a fair critique of the premise behind the "campaign" "Blowjobs for Bush" by highlighting the '98 bombing of Iraq that I ignored in my article. I also left out other wars Clinton advocated, including the '92 bombing of Iraq and the Bosnian war. If my article was solely about this campaign, I would have no argument against his analysis.

Instead, my article discusses the problems behind this campaign to illustrate the larger problem of women's power during war. Hanlon shortens the title of my article from "Blowjobs for Bush: Feeling Ineffectual in a Time of War" to simply "Blowjobs for Bush." His analysis provides no hint that I would view my proposed campaign as problematic, which is far from the truth.

My intention was not to provide a complex political analysis of Clinton and U.S. President George W. Bush. This is obvious in my article. I use various rhetorical strategies to show that I do not take "Blowjobs for Bush" seriously and in fact want to draw on its humor.

While Hanlon argues that this "slick one-liner" is "counterproductive to its message," I claim that the language I use to describe "Blowjobs for Bush" does not send the message that people should take it seriously. My rhetoric becomes obvious (and to be taken as a joke) when I shorten the phrase to "BJ4B," state that it is "the solution" to war and colloquially use "screw" and "suck."

My article discusses the problems behind this campaign to illustrate the larger problem of women's power during war.

I realize that my intentions may have failed. A critique that reduces my work to its most simplistic and basic level, while ignoring the main theme that war is an act of violence against women, is lazy and appropriates a harmful sexist bias.

Sincerely,
Courtney Spohn-Larkins '03

Management project announced

To the Editor:

Every year, University students taking Management 101 have a challenge to run a successful business company, while giving back to the community at the same time. This year, Company D, also known as D's Shorts, is no different.

Headed by CEO Michael Mathes '05, D's Shorts will be selling its Bucknell Mesh shorts to benefit Haven Ministries, a shelter for the homeless located in Sunbury. At Haven Ministries, the members of the group have been, and will continue to be, doing work repainting various rooms.

Additionally, Company D will be spending overnight visits to help the Haven Ministries staff free up some of its time, as someone needs to be in the building at all times.

In addition to this, at the end of the work, the members of D's Shorts will be hosting a dinner for the staff and the residents of Haven Ministries.

The shorts will be sold in the Langone Center from April 8-15, excluding Saturday and Sunday. Please come support Company D in their mission, and purchase a pair or two of D's Shorts.

Sincerely,

Mike McCarthy '03

Campus rally organizers thank attendees

To the Editor:

I am writing on behalf of the Conservatives Club to thank the many members of the University support staff who attended our March 28 Support Our Troops rally. It was touching to see people give up their lunch break in order to show their appreciation of the men and women of the United States Armed Forces—particularly the family whose son is in Iraq right now—and we are thrilled that we were able to sponsor an event that they deemed worthy of their participation. Thank you all so much.

Sincerely,

More information on Nicaraguan-made T-shirts

To the Editor:

I am writing you in regards to the article from last week's Bucknellian entitled "Greeks buy T-shirts from Nicaraguan co-op." First off, I want to say how pleased I am with the coverage that the article gave to the women's co-op and the Bucknell Brigade. It was wonderfully written and full of important information that we are glad you could help us spread on campus.

There was one mistake that we wanted to clarify for anyone interested in ordering T-shirts. The T-shirts that the Greek Week Committee ordered were not $8 but $6. The future price of orders may be different as we are working out a new price scale for orders with larger numbers yielding a cheaper price per shirt.

We also wanted to draw attention and thanks to some other people who were key contributors to making this purchase from the co-op happen. Dean of Students Lewis Marrara and Assistant Dean of Sorority and Fraternity Affairs Shauna Irwin helped in approving the use of the women's co-op. We must again thank the Greek Week Committee in all their work throughout Greek Week and for making the decision to use a worker-owned cooperative for the T-shirts. And finally, we thank the members of the March Brigade, led by Ben Colby '03, Kristine Kengor '03, Assistant Professor of Women's Studies and Anthropology Coralynn Davis and University Chaplan Ian Oliver. They lugged more than one thousand T-shirts back after an exhausting week of work down in Nueva Vida! Many thanks to you all of you!

Keep up the great work you are doing with The Bucknellian and thank you for the interesting articles!

Sincerely,

Katie Kohn '03

Humanities and science: a tale of two studies

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

What's the difference between a pizza and a liberal arts major? Well, a pizza can feed a family of five.

OK, so what does an engineering student use for contraception? His personality.

Ah, academia's most poignant witticisms. So what is the deal with the harsh opposition between these two fields of study, between scientists and artists? And where should the fence-straddling social sciences fit in?

"Sociology. Art history. Pshh. Political 'science'—a contradiction in terms, 'fluff' courses, they don't even compare to the rigor of physics, chemistry and engineering. Why else would liberal arts majors so rarely have class? Give me some nuclear spectroscopy annihilation peak data, the decay scheme of sodium-22 radioisotopes and six pack of beer, and I'll show you the nature of being." So say the scientists.

But the humanists always retort with sharp, funny and frequently nasty rebuttals. Oftentimes these arguments are more eloquent as well (is has to be the W2 requirement).

"Just because you can measure it doesn't mean it's important," they "The problem with science is that logic and rules are treated like deities. Science is a metaphor only dimly aware of itself as such—the humanities, on the other hand, are too important to be restricted by science's self-imposed shackles and structures." So argue the liberal arts majors.

And the scientists claim, "But if you are not grounding the study in logic, you are grounding it in nothing, and so it is inherently false—logic will take you from A to B."

And inevitably the liberal arts majors retort once again, "Ha! Logic will only allow you to think in strict accordance with the limitations and incapacities of human misunderstanding. Logic may take you from A to B, but imagination will take you everywhere."

In the fall of this year I will graduate with a double major in physics and anthropology—so I've been subject to both sides of the hostilities, and what I've noticed is that these two groups really have no quarrel at all.

Granted, liberal arts students invariably wince in pain when they hear anything having remotely to do with equations, superstring theory or relativity theory. But physics is at least worthy of serving as a thought experiment. Don't give up on the sciences altogether! The field may rest on cold, hard and impersonal logic, but that doesn't mean that it's entirely wrong across the board or that it doesn't still serve as an important footing for knowledge.

And then there are the science majors (and the engineers), who always assume that the humanities and the social sciences are so much easier than the engineering courses, and that the engineers must inevitably be smarter—fewer class hours, no labs, that's the lazy life. Or perhaps the science majors are just jealous of the intellectual freedom offered in the humanities. Who knows?

I understand that the sciences may be rather restrictive to the mind —you know, all those laws and rules you have to obey ... Last week in my general relativity physics course we discussed Kruskal-Szekeres diagrams of singularities and theoretical black holes (yeah, like anyone really knows what those are), and you know what I ended up learning? Well, beyond absolutely nothing, that I couldn't even travel to a parallel universe if I wanted to! More than slightly annoyed, I managed to avoid the expletive, grimaced and said to myself, "Three years of physics courses, and I can't even travel to a parallel universe?"

The beautiful thing about the humanities, in my opinion, is that they examine our deeply personal, lived experiences (slightly more significant in daily life than black hole theory and singularities).

So in the end, I realize the value of the sciences in giving direction to the future of the liberal arts. And ultimately it comes down to nothing more than individual preference.

My personal preference is to side with the humanities because, after all, science tends to vindicate its "truth" with a technological prowess that hastens the destruction of the everyday lived experiences ... also I had a bad experience in a math course once.

The price of free speech is vigilance

Late in the 1980s, corporate media companies lobbied hard to have the Fairness Doctrine overturned by the Federal Communications Commission. The media guidelines regulated talk shows on radio and television in the area of content or programming. Programmers were strongly encouraged to provide representatives of both sides of controversial issues within their programs. This encouraged a debate format on a wide range of issues and an environment of broad station ownership provided a healthy forum for spirited public debate. The large media companies got their way and the regulation was overturned under the Reagan administration. The forum of the national electronic town meeting was effectively and publicly silenced through the effective use of campaign contributions to political party operatives of both parties.

Corporations like Clear Channel Communications then began to lobby for the relaxation of ownership-limitation requirements in markets, which kept station ownership diverse especially in the smaller media markets.

Within two years programs, like the one hosted by conservative Rush Limbaugh and the local cloned programs patterned after his format were filling up the airwaves with conservatively-screened callers and one-sided views on the topics of the day. Debate is no longer the goal. Instead, a well-produced spectacle that gets listeners and advertisers is the goal. This is how liberal radio talk shows became extinct.

Media concentration became a reality when the Clinton administration relaxed ownership standards through the 1996 Telecommunication Act, allowing corporate media giants like Clear Channel to dominate entire media markets. Locally, Williamsport AM and FM radio outlets are predominantly owned by Clear Channel. This is how, through contract, Limbaugh gets access to over 600 stations. Limbaugh's dominance is considerable in the broadcasting industry and so is Clear Channel Communications' 1200 radio-station empire, operated from Texas.

Clear Channel has been vilified in the press for its "heavy-handedness" in running its radio stations and in its management of concert venues. Record companies and artists state that Clear Channel consistently drives up concert ticket prices. Artists also complain that Clear Channel is a major culprit responsible for the growing blandness of radio program playlists in the United States. One outcome of the high ticket prices is illustrated by the fact that Paul McCartney was the highest concert draw last year because promoters could market his "brand name" at the expense of promotion budgets for newer acts. McCartney has not had a hit in years, but "boomer" memories are ripe for the picking. Baby boomers can afford to pay the price, but younger concert-goers suffer from fewer artist choices that speak to their generational tastes. This targeting makes for a blander, safer kind of music in general, as a centralized, controlling media concentrates its message to the public.

According to PeacenotWar.org, "Clear Channel Entertainment also threatened to pull the plug on DiFranco or anyone else that made anti-war statements on stage."

Artists like Ani DiFranco are beginning to encounter harassment from Clear Channel. The corporation attempted to bar groups from distributing protest literature at a recent Ani DiFranco concert in New Jersey. According to PeacenotWar.org, "Clear Channel Entertainment also threatened to pull the plug on DiFranco or anyone else that made anti-war statements on stage."

PeacenotWar.org also reported, "Clear Channel forbade the peace group Not in Our Name (NION) from setting up an information table at the venue or to allow their posters and literature to be available at DiFranco's merchandise tables. To DiFranco's credit, her manger decided to let a representative of NION speak on stage. Clear Channel moved to pull the plug. DiFranco said through her manager that 'If the venue stops the speakers from addressing the audience, Ani will not perform.' The plug was not pulled. NION was joined onstage by various speakers and journalists. DiFranco then fulfilled her contracted obligation and performed to a receptive crowd."

Vigilance will be required if the right to speak out is to be preserved. Regardless of your feelings on the opinions of the Dixie Chicks, Bill Maher, Rush Limbaugh, Michael Moore, Tim Robbins, James Woods, Ani DiFranco or Charlton Heston, corporate media types should not determine personal speech rights for anyone. Financial resources and campaign contributions should not qualify Clear Channel as a constitutional judge. Any chilling, decadent lapses toward a type of 1950's style McCarthyism over public speech should be fought by us all. DiFranco shamed Clear Channel and we all should go on shaming corporate misbehavior when it assumes a role that it clearly should not.

The other half of your balanced reporting on Iraq

By Tim Hinkle
Staff Writer

So we figured it would go easy in Iraq. They told us we would secure Iraq and "liberate" its people in a few short days. They told us we would expect little resistance and that the people and the military of Iraq would rally around our cause in the desire to be free of the tyranny of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. Well, if you've been paying attention, you're beginning to see that this is absolutely and categorically false.

Back in the summer of 2002, the U.S. military did extensive preparation and training for Iraqi-like war scenarios called Millennium Challenge '02. The outcome of these exercises gave the military much hope that a possible war with Iraq would be relatively swift and without loss of life. We're finding out now that this is not the case at all. Retired Gen. Paul Van Riper, who led the war-games' opposing force, said he "worries the United States will send troops into combat using doctrine and weapons systems based on false conclusions from the recently concluded Millennium Challenge '02." He was so disgusted with the scripted nature and forced outcome of Millennium Challenge '02 that he quit midway through the $250 million, three-week war game.

If you've somehow been paying attention through the University's "bubble," then you've certainly realized that the war isn't going exactly as we planned. This is hard information to come by when you begin to see the widespread censorship of anti-war ideas and unfavorable reporting. NBC recently severed ties with a veteran war journalist for making comments about how the administration's war plans had failed in their initial implementation, despite that his comments were "analytical in nature and were not intended to be anything more." From Clear Channel Entertainment, a massive media conglomerate that controls the vast majority of radio stations in the United States effectively banning any anti-war ideas, to MTV refusing to air any videos that include the words "bombing" or "war," to U.S. President George W. Bush complaining about how reporters were questioning the details of the U.S. war in Iraq, we can see that freedom of speech and expression is not a valued concept in a time of war.

On the humanitarian front, this war is a nightmare for the people of Iraq. Due to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's decision to send decidedly fewer troops than the Pentagon originally asked for, America's relentless push towards Baghdad has left much of the rest of Iraq under the control of Iraqi militants. Sure, we hear sporadic reports of Iraqi citizens rising up against their oppressors, but this is hardly widespread. At the same time some are also fighting against coalition forces. Why, you ask, are the people of Iraq not welcoming their American and British "liberators" with open arms? Well, if you don't remember the first Gulf War, the Iraqi people certainly do. When Americans rolled into Iraq the first time, they encouraged Iraqi civilians to rise up against Hussein, and then quickly and quietly retreated, allowing Hussein to violently and ruthlessly put down their American-inspired rebellion. So forgive them if they don't trust our intentions. Coalition forces also recently bombed Iraqi television offices in violation of the Geneva Convention.

What we are not seeing reported on American television stations is a balance of images. After complaints from Administration and media officials about American dead and POWs being shown on television, the American media has repeatedly shown Iraqi dead and POWs. Reporting on a war without showing its real effects is ridiculous. What about those unfortunate civilian casualties, those people who get to be named "collateral damage?"

U.S. Sgt. Schrumpf, recalling one such incident in which an Iraqi woman was unfortunately standing near a group of Iraqi soldiers and was gunned down by U.S. forces, said, "I'm sorry, but the chick was in the way." According to embedded reporter Mark Franchetti of the Times of London, American troops, under orders to shoot anything that moved, recently opened fire of a group of Iraqi citizens attempting to flee the town of Nasiriya, which was under heavy Iraqi bombardment.

How can you mention humanitarian crises without mentioning the town of Basra? Although what happened is still not exactly clear, some reports indicate that after two U.S. precision-guided bombs struck a crowded marketplace, a nightmarish scenario unfolded. According to Robert Frisk in The Independent, "At least 15 cars burst into flames, burning many of their occupants to death. Several men tore desperately at the doors of another flame-shrouded car in the center of the street that had been flipped upside down by the same missile. They were forced to watch helplessly as the woman and her three children inside were cremated alive in front of them." After initially reporting that coalition forces had secured Basra, they left soon after for Baghdad, leaving the town open for Hussein's forces, which returned the following day. Ah, sweet, sweet liberation.

What is the deal with small talk?

By Jordy Leiser
Writer

My roommate says that small talk is essential for a society to function. So let me get this straight, the following conversation is necessity for the American culture to operate:

"Hey! What's up?"
"Not much, how are you?"
"I'm good, thanks."
"Later, man."

This is about as necessary as Dennis Rodman dressing in a wedding gown for his book signing party. Is the point of this exchange to actually find out if the person with whom you are talking is actually doing well? I would say ... no.

The above exchange of uninterested questions and responses is so embedded in our culture and our language that I occasionally hear people repeat lines of the conversation in a completely wrong context, only out of habit. For example, have you ever heard this one?

"Hi, Jack! How are you doing?"
"Oh, nothing much, what are you doing?"
"I'm alright."

First of all, how stupid do you sound when you give a response like, "Oh, nothing much" to a question that asks you how you are doing? How, in case you have forgotten, is a question of manner, way, degree or extent. How am I doing? I'm doing nothing? That makes no sense! What about the people who, when you ask them what they are doing, say, "I'm doing good." First off, that is just terrible grammar. Secondly, and more importantly, it's a habitual response that makes absolutely no sense.

If it were up to me, I would completely get rid of the whole "Hi, how are you" tête-à-tête and replace it with a new word, something completely random and arbitrary like, "Seegarf!" Since the discourse has completely lost all of its meaning, we are better off saying a word that has no real meaning except to acknowledge the indicated person.

Another form of small talk is not so much what is said, but more what is nodded. Yeah, that's right, the nod. What situation, calls for the "up nod?" The one where you jolt your chin up about half an inch, usually directed at a specific individual? I think that's the, "Yo, what up, man?" nod. He or she is likely a pretty close friend, and on occasion a one or two fingers point may be directed in said person's vicinity.

Next you have the "slant nod." This can signal two things. One, if you want a person to come closer to you, you'll usually rock the slant nod. Secondly, the slant nod can come from a sitting small talker who has to turn his or her head to see the person with whom the small talk will be exchanged, and the up nod will be performed with a turned head, creating another variation of the slant nod.

Finally, the small talk of all small talks, AOL Instant Messenger (IM). OK, I understand it has a purpose, but please don't abuse the powers of the internet chat box. I'm limiting my time on IM, and when I'm on, you better believe I know what I'm doing. For example:

"Yo, Erns, what time are we playing?"
"5:30, Dawg."
"OK, who's coming?"
"Brangle, T-bot, Keniff, Karesy, Troasty and Joey."
"Word."

There you have it. The night is squared away in five short lines of bona fide college vernacular. When people start throwing out sarcastic comments, joking comments, serious comments, ridiculous comments, drunken comments or any other kinds of comments that don't concisely satisfy the answer to the simple who, what, where, when, why or how questions, it's an abuse of the power of the chat box.

It's nearly impossible to avoid sticky small talk situations. Remember what I said about the clichéd exchange. Are you genuinely concerned about how the person is doing? Unless you're truly interested in how I'm doing or what the hell is going on in my life, just sport me the slant nod next time you see me and holler out a relaxing, smooth ... "Seegarf!"

America's urgent war on hunger

By Nicole Wiederspiel
Staff Writer

I have been fighting—through peaceful means—with my pacifist tendencies for a while now. We live in a society where pacifists are dreamers, idealists, fools—cowards. I always ask myself: Can war ever be justified if it will kill in order to save lives in the future? To this I have no answer.

But I do know that the war in Iraq spells unspeakable disaster, and I am afraid. Disaster for us, disaster for them, disaster for humanity—and I wonder: What is my future in America, a country that I love, as a war and violence hater? How do I contend with those who say I am anti-American and unpatriotic, and how do I contend with visions of a bleak and violent future?

I guess first I ought to tell you why I am so virulently against war, and this war in particular.

I like this quote in particular from, ironically, former U.S. President Dwight Eisenhower: "Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired, signifies in a final sense a theft from those who hunger and are not fed—those who are cold and are not clothed. This world in arms is not spending its money alone—it is spending the sweat of its laborers, the genius of its scientists, the hopes of its children."

As I see it, it is criminal to be dropping bombs on Iraq or anywhere else because it does nothing but increase human suffering. There is indeed a great evil in Iraq. It is oppressive, murderous and brutally destructive, and I am not talking about Iraq President Saddam Hussein. It needs urgent action, and requires Westerners to promptly change their way of life.

I'm talking about poverty and hunger, and a disproportionate number of people on this planet suffer from its consequences every single day. If we have the technology to make weapons of mass destruction, then surely we can figure out how to provide enough food for every person on the planet.

"They are exacerbating this crisis by dropping bombs and creating terror—as if the Iraqi people haven't suffered enough under Hussein's regime."

We have the resources to feed everyone, yet an estimated 24,000 die every day from starvation. Technology has failed us and there can never be any human progress in my mind until people are no longer denied the most basic human right—the right to life.

Yet we are waging war in Iraq, promising to rid the country of a despot and bringing glorious democracy to an oppressed region. Proponents of the war forget that people can't enjoy democracy and political freedoms when they are dead, and I am too cynical to truly believe that the United States and the United Kingdom will remain in Iraq after the war is over to ensure a peaceful transition to a new government. The United States left Afghanistan in a state in crisis, and it will do it again.

The war that must be fought is the war against poverty and hunger, and it cannot be fought through handouts and charity, but through a change in foreign policy, Western habits of over consumption and global awareness.

Our administration, if it indeed is in Iraq to "help" the Iraqi people—which can certainly be debated—ought to be more concerned with the human rights crisis that has existed there. They are exacerbating this crisis by dropping bombs and creating terror—as if the Iraqi people haven't suffered enough under Hussein's regime.

If believing this makes people think that I am anti-American because I don't think the Americans "over there" are heroes—although I pray that they will come home safely—then I challenge them to consider what America represents, because currently it is representing violence and oppression.

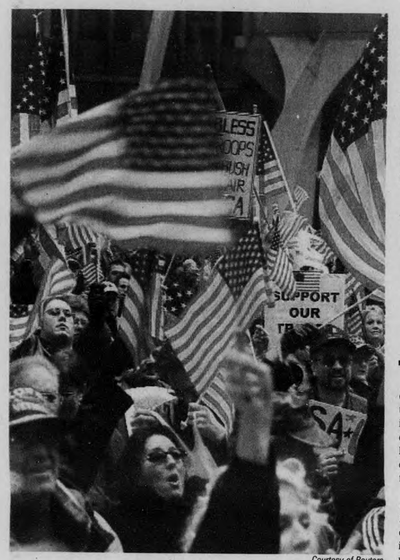
Divided: student perspectives on Iraqi conflict

Iraqi war criticism narrow-minded

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Operation Iraqi Freedom is a hotly contested conflict around the world. Nations sending troops into battle oppose it. Our neighbors to our north and south oppose it. Traditional allies oppose it. We seem to be alone in the world. On top of all that, many Americans oppose the war. There seem to be daily protests. We even see anti-war sentiment on campus.



Courtesy of Reuters

Pro-war supporters gather to demonstrate their support in Chicago's Federal Plaza. Leahy feels U.S. patriotism remains, despite anti-war sentiment.

At the same time, American patriotism remains. There are rallies supporting our president and our troops. We are continuing with our great pastimes—the NCAA basketball tournaments went off as scheduled and even the baseball season we nationally adore began, with former President George Bush throwing out the first pitch in Cincinnati. In addition, we pray for the safety of our troops in our religious services and whenever else we can.

Some of the criticism is certainly valid, but it is narrow-minded. Civilians will die and are dying. But, the Iraqi government uses human shields to protect its own army. Due to the threat of suicide bombers, incidents occur at checkpoints like the one where forces killed 10 women and children when they failed to stop. Our precision-guided bombs and missiles are never perfect, yet they work remarkably well most of the time.

Global support under the auspices of the U.N. Security Council would certainly have helped our cause. There is no doubt about that, but there are a number of nations standing alongside us to support our efforts to free the Iraqi people. This is not going to be an easy rebuilding—in Iraq and around the world—once the war is over, but the United States and the international community can do it.

The following are 10 things that I am reminded of when watching and reading the war's news and events. They remind me why we fight and why I continue to supported this war.

First, President George W. Bush and his administration are doing a good job. The president's approval rating is above 60 percent and he is working to ensure that our forces are equipped to execute this war. We continue to send troops overseas to back up those already in Iraq. His administration has the experience to carry out this war and, despite the internal debate we hear, it feels good about its mission and will stop at nothing to carry it out.

Second, our casualty rates are low. One tough thing we have working against us is that we know the names, faces and families of the troops seconds after they die. When we consider how dangerous war really is, it is amazing that we are losing as few as we are. The Iraqi army is overmatched and losing troops in numbers that far overshadow ours.

Third, look at New York Times pictures of our Marines holding children and making sure they get the necessary care. We are keeping them safe and intend to give them a chance to enjoy a new era of Iraq.

Fourth, the amount of humanitarian aid that will continue flowing into Iraq is staggering and vital. We will be working hard over the next several months to ensure that Iraqi citizens have safe food and water and get access to medical care.

Fifth, this is a war of liberation. Operation Iraqi Freedom seeks to change the oppressive regime in Baghdad and give liberation to the Iraqi people, not kill them.

Sixth, this war is not about oil. We are not going to own Iraqi oil fields once it is over. We want to preserve an amazing source of subterranean wealth so that Iraq has a good source of revenue to rebuild. Americans will benefit from lower oil prices only because Iraqi oil is pumped by and for the Iraqi people.

Seventh, we are not colonizers. We do not intend to hold Iraq any longer than it takes to install a peaceful regime in Baghdad. Our coalition forces are riding, not conquering, Iraqi cities of Hussein and the Ba'ath Party's influences so the citizens can have the cities for themselves.

What they must remember is that we are fighting for a good cause and now is the time to support the government, not create more division.

Eighth, our troops are fighting for our safety and security. They voluntarily put their lives on the line so we can continue to live in a free nation. It is inspiring to see injured soldiers want to return to the battlefield. We should be in debt to them.

Ninth, we are fighting for the freedoms that allow this university to exist. The fact that we can study at a private university of this caliber in beautiful Lewisburg is something to be thankful for. And remember, so many of those soldiers could be here with us. Instead, they are on the front lines defending our freedom.

Tenth, we are fighting for what puts the ink on this page. The right to freedom of speech is something not granted in Iraq. Those people live in fear every day knowing that any speech against Hussein will get them killed. This is no way to live. We are working to ensure that they will have the same freedoms we so vehemently defend here.

Finally, I must say that some sentiments expressed by people are plainly dumb. "Freedom Fries," "Freedom Toast," not wearing Hermes ties, throwing out French wines, booing national anthems and mutilating flags are stupid things. People do have the right to protest the government. What they must remember is that we are fighting for a good cause and now is the time to support the government, not create more division.

Americans want answers, not war

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

Why all the controversy about invading Iraq? Despite what the Bush administration has said to the public and national media, the case with Iraq draws on global proportions. It's about the few controlling the wealth and resources of the Middle East, a goal that has been postponed since the badly miscalculated projections by the United States after the Gulf War.

Expecting opposition groups in Iraq to overtake Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, the Republican Guard and his Ba'ath regime during the aftermath of Desert Storm, the United States was very optimistic regarding the possibility of working with a new "puppet" regime in 1992 in order to reap huge profits in rebuilding the war-torn country. In finding that such a circumstance would never materialize, the pundits of the first Bush administration have regrouped to reassess and re-enact their goal 11 years later.

What we have is an illegitimate president, fostering an illegitimate war, for an illegitimate cause.

According to Newsweek, the love affair between the United States and Iraq ended abruptly in 1986 when Iraq had learned that the United States had been secretly sending arms to its enemy, Iran. Since the Ayatollah Khomeni took over Iran in 1979, the United States had shifted its focus to the improvement of relations with Iraq in order to maintain social and economic stability in the region.

Newsweek also reported that former U.S. President Ronald Reagan sent Donald Rumsfeld, president of G.D. Searle & Co., a worldwide pharmaceutical company, to meet with Hussein in 1983 as a special envoy to discuss oil contracts and other economic interests. Even more frightening was Rumsfeld's objective to negotiate the sale of biological and chemical weapons to Hussein as a means of defense in Iraq's war against Iran.

The 1980s U.S.-Iraq honeymoon was also characterized by a wag-the-dog policy towards Iraq. After the Shah fell in 1979, Iraq was taken off the list of international terrorism and given an annual grant from the United States and funded extensively throughout the Iran-Iraq War. CNN revealed declassified documents suggesting Rumsfeld traveled to Baghdad at a time when Iraq was using chemical weapons on an "almost daily" basis in defiance of international conventions. Under relaxed U.S. policy, the Reagan-Bush Administration turned the other cheek when Iraqi forces nearly sunk the USS Stark in 1987, killing 37 naval personnel.

MSNBC briefly posted a statement last month revealing that a review of thousands of declassified government documents and interviews with former policymakers showed that U.S. intelligence and logistical support played a crucial role in shoring up Iraqi defenses against the "human wave" attacks of suicidal Iranian troops. The administrations of Reagan and former U.S. President George Bush authorized the sale to Iraq of many items that had both military and civilian applications, including poisonous chemicals and deadly biological viruses. The Reagan administration decided to support Iraq as much as possible, without appearing to do so.

Anti-war protesters demonstrate in front of the White House. According to Dudzinski, the case for invading Iraq has not been made.

In 1996, CNN reported that Rumsfeld sent a private memo to U.S. President Bill Clinton urging a U.S.-led takeover of Iraq in relevance to the vital oil and mineral resources that exist there. Rather than purchase Iraqi oil at the issued price per gallon, the goal was to conquer and control the oil market for personal gain and for the economic well-being of the United States.

Regardless of the strategic political and economic importance of Iraq to the United States, the case for invading Iraq has not yet been made. What we have is an illegitimate president, fostering an illegitimate war, for an illegitimate cause.

Most surprising about the Iraqi case in the war on terror is that Hussein does not support or harbor terrorists for simple reasoning that it would justify his removal from power.

It is only justifiable that the Bush administration continues to conceal the real cause for invading Iraq. The events of Sept. 11 were inexcusably used as an opportune pretext by the Bush administration to occupy Iraq for economic and political capital.

The American people want an answer, and war is not it. By way of deception and refusal to accept the wishes of the public and international community, the Bush administration illegally orchestrated an invasion of Iraq on March 19. Contrary to popular opinion, war will only result in anti-Americanism and more terrorism at home and abroad.

If that fact does not serve as a compelling explanation of why war should be avoided in Iraq, then the people of the United States need to reassess the meaning of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

History does repeat itself, and those who do not learn from the errors of the past are doomed to repeat them. One interesting statement made by a former Nazi general at the Nuremberg trials indicates that these lessons from our forefathers need to be given more consideration and significance. Here is one lesson that rings loudly today, a statement made by Hermann Goering, who was once a master of deception:

"Why of course the people don't want war…But after all it is the leaders of the country who determine the policy, and it is always a simple matter to drag the people along, whether it is a democracy, or a fascist dictatorship, or a parliament, or a communist dictatorship….Voice or no voice, the people can always be brought to the bidding of the leaders. That is easy. All you have to do is to tell them they are being attacked, and denounce the pacifists for lack of patriotism and exposing the country to danger."

History is repeating itself. The case with Iraq has marked the pinnacle of propaganda and deception in the United States. Such realization is enough to justify the discontent and opposition of the American people towards the current president and his administration.

Violence may end Maoist rebellion

By David LaRoss

For seven years, Nepal has been host to what has become a rare phenomenon in the post-Cold War era—a popular communist-inspired uprising. Talks that began on Tuesday may include definitive negotiations between the Nepali government and the Maoist rebels. Regardless of, whether those talks succeed, they might mark the end of the most violent period in the rebellion's history. Of the 7,200 total deaths in the uprising, 5,500 came in the 14 months since the last truce, and the state of emergency declared by King Gyanendra in August 2001 was not lifted until November 2002.

The announcement of the talks came on March 28, almost two months after the sides agreed to a ceasefire. According to the Associated Press, that ceasefire came only days after the insurgency allegedly killed Krishna Mohan Shrestha, inspector general of Nepal's Armed Police. The assassination, which CNN called "a major escalation" in the rebellion, took place on Jan. 26. The Nepali government and the rebels jointly declared a ceasefire three days later. At the same time, the government announced that it was rescinding its classification of the rebels as "terrorists" and canceling both the bounty it placed on the leaders of the movement and its standing request to Interpol for their arrest.

"The government wishes that all problems be solved through dialogue," Minister for Information and Communication Ramesh Nath Pandey said after an emergency Cabinet meeting, according to CNN. "We will resolve our differences on the basis of patriotism and according to monarchical culture."

That "monarchical culture" is at the heart of the conflict. Despite the roots they claim in the philosophy of Chinese communist leader Mao Tse-tung, the Nepali rebels are fighting to replace the constitutional monarchy with a representative government with free elections, not any kind of Marxist system.

According to The New York Times, their most immediate demand has been for the swift dissolution of the monarchy, to be replaced by an interim government while a new constitution is written and approved by an elected assembly.

The last peace talks were held in 2001 and broke off after only three meetings, after the Maoist negotiators accused the government of being "inflexible," according to CNN.

The most recent talks have not yet begun in any substantive sense. Though representatives from both sides met on Tuesday, that meeting was "only a goodwill meeting between the two sides," government negotiator and Minister for Physical Planning Narayan Singh Pun told CNN.

Even the agenda for the talks has not yet been set, although it will follow in some way a 22-point plan released in early March, which includes the release of all prisoners on both sides.

"We have presented the Maoist leaders with a proposal of what the agenda should be and they said they appreciate our efforts in this peace process," Pun said to CNN.

The seven-year rebellion has seriously hurt the economy of Nepal. As one of the poorer countries on the Pacific Rim, its revenues heavily rely on tourism and agriculture, both of which have been disrupted by the fighting. Foreign visits in particular have declined, as evidenced by the U.S. State Department's recommendation that American travelers avoid Nepal altogether, saying that it poses "significant risks." Even in light of the recent ceasefire, a State Department press release warns that "a return to violence at any time is possible," and reminds American citizens of the sudden breaking of the 2001 ceasefire that led to significantly and suddenly increased hostilities.

The Nepali newspaper Rajdhani said in an editorial reacting to the ceasefire, translated by The New York Times, "This is very good news for the nation. This is also the rarest opportunity in the nation's history and the most challenging one."

Bison win three straight over Holy Cross

Bucknell baseball takes three out of four games in the team's first Patriot League series of the year

The Bucknell baseball team's first Patriot League series of the year was a successful one, as the Bison took three out of four games against Holy Cross over the weekend. The team defeated the Crusaders on both ends of a doubleheader on March 29, 5-4 and 3-2 and split a doubleheader on March 31, winning 8-6 and losing 5-1.

The second doubleheader was initially scheduled for March 30, but in keeping with the trend of cancellations due to the elements this season, both games had to be postponed due to rain. The Bison were back on the diamond Monday to square off against the Crusaders at Holy Cross.

The first of the two games included a stirring comeback from the Bison, who found themselves in a 6-0 hole by the third inning. The team struggled to get on base until the fourth inning, when they began to eat away at Holy Cross' lead with a four-run frame.

After Brian Day '05 was walked, Brian Hirschberg '04, Austin Barrett '05 and Ben Krentzman '03 all knocked out singles, with Day and Hirschberg scoring on Krentzman's hit. With Krentzman on second and Barrett on third, a wild pitch hit the dirt and bounced off of the catcher's shin guard, allowing Barrett to head for home and Krentzman to advance to third. The catcher's attempt to flip the ball to the pitcher went awry, allowing both Bison to score.

The Bison knotted the score in the sixth inning and then jumped ahead with two more runs. Barrett kicked off the inning with a double into right field, and Krentzman followed with a single to put runners on the corners for the Bison. Barrett then scored as Kyle Walter '06 reached on error. A walk and a fielder's choice left the bases loaded for Ben Stoll '04, who singled home Pete Wolf '04 and Walter for the go-ahead run. Stoll's seventh stolen base of the season and a Sam Moss '04 single loaded the bases, and Krentzman scored the fourth run of the inning when Day was hit by a pitch.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Starting pitcher Zach Allen '03 held Holy Cross scoreless in the fourth and fifth innings, while Cory Nadler '04 pitched a scoreless sixth and Phil Futrick '06 pitched a quick seventh inning to earn his fourth save of the season.

Allen pitched five innings, allowing seven hits and four earned runs while striking out seven en route to his third win of the year.

Allen is happy with the team's efforts in the opening series.

"This opening series with Holy Cross went very well," Allen said. "Although we would have liked to take four from them, three wins was very good. As a team we played very well, but need to improve on all aspects of our game in this coming week to prepare for Navy."

The team's effort in climbing out of the 6-0 hole was proof of the squad's resilience, according to Head Coach Gene Depew.

"In the third game we came from a six-run deficit to win and that is the mark of a good team," Depew said.

The second game of the doubleheader brought the Bison their first Patriot League loss of the season, as they fell to the Crusaders 5-1.

The lone run for the Orange and Blue came on Hirschberg's fourth home run of the season, which gave the team a 1-0 in the second inning.

The lead was short-lived, as Holy Cross came to life in the fourth inning, scoring three runs on four hits. The Crusaders tacked on another pair of runs in a four-hit fifth inning, putting them ahead 5-1, which ended up being the final score of the game.

Although the first game on Monday was a gutsy effort, the second pair of games of the series revealed some weaknesses that the Bison need to improve upon, according to Assistant Coach Rick Ciccione.

"This weekend was bittersweet for us," Ciccione said. "While we were able to win three of four games, we saw some things that were cause for concern. Holy Cross is the poorest team in the conference, and we were very nearly swept by them."

Ciccione pointed out that some of the team's strong points earlier in the season were less than dependable in the Holy Cross series, but he also emphasized the promising tenacity the team displayed.

"Our starting pitching wasn't as dominating as it has been, our offense still strikes out too frequently, and our defense was inconsistent," Ciccione said. "With that said, to battle back from behind and win three close games says a lot about our resiliency."

Starting pitcher and co-captain R.J. Grant '03 also took note of the concerns caused by the close calls.

Track competes in Raleigh Relays

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

Bucknell's track and field teams had many big performances as they split their squads between the Susquehanna Invite and the Raleigh Relays at N.C. State on March 28-29.

Theresa Dennis '03 and Angie McFarland '05 led the womens team. Dennis ran 36 minutes, 18 seconds in a very competitive 10k field at Raleigh that saw four women dip under the NCAA automatic qualifying time. McFarland was ruled very successful on the field at Susquehanna as she won the hammer, only two centimeters shy of the NCAA regional mark, and took second in both the discuss and the shot put.

Head Coach Kevin Donner was very happy with both girls' performances.

"Theresa Dennis ran a great race in the 10k and Angie McFarland had an outstanding day at Susquehanna. [Dennis] looks like she can place top 5 at ECACs," Donner said.

The women's sprint medley team of Amy Calvo '05, Charity Brady '03, Rainy Lanewala '05 and Nicki Piper '03 also ran a solid race at Raleigh.

The men were led by an NCAA regional qualifying javelin throw from Justin McKnight '03 and a one-foot personal best in the pole vault from Justin Alden-Dunn '06.

"Alden-Dunn's vault was a pleasant surprise mainly because he is a freshman," Donner said. "He really comes to play on competition days. It's good to see

Women's tennis edges out Lafayette

The team is now 9-1 overall and 1-0 in the Patriot League after win over Leopards

By Pat Evans

The Bison women's tennis team was tied 3-3 after the singles bouts but was able to win the crucial doubles point to beat Lafayette 4-3 in a league game at home. The team is now 9-1 overall and 1-0 in the Patriot League. The men's team has continued to have difficulty, dropping 6-1 to Lafayette, 7-0 to Navy and 7-0 to American and is now 1-10 overall and 0-1 in league play.

Veronica Brown '06 got the wins started for the women with a 6-3, 6-1 straight set victory over Lily Fardshisheh at No. 2. Jill Wurzburg '03 followed with a solid 7-5, 7-6 (3) win against Shannon Rowe at the third flight.

Rheanna Gaskin '06 helped to keep the Orange and Blue in the match with a 6-1, 6-2 win over fifth-flight opponent Lisa Fung-Kee-Fung, and the Bison were tied 3-3 after singles play.

"We were lucky to pull it out," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "We didn't play up to our potential in singles play where we should have won the match."

Fortunately for the Bison, the doubles teams were on top of their games and able to achieve the win. Brown and Nadezda Curcic '05 picked up an 8-5 win at the first flight.

Wurzburg and Samantha Berthod '04 secured the Bucknell victory with an 8-4 defeat at No. 3.

"The two doubles teams really stepped it up," Gaskin said. "They really won the match for us."

The Bison have had tremendous help from their underclassmen this year as Gaskin is undefeated in singles play and Brown is playing phenomenally at a high spot in the lineup. Brown's play earned her the Patriot League Player of the Month award for March.

The men have been unable to get on track, losing their last three matches to difficult opponents. The Lafayette competition was the closest of the three.

Despite Gerald DiChiara '05 being the lone winner for the Bison, Asher Salam '05 and Joe Menezes '05 both took their opponents to all three sets before losing, proving that the Bison were competitive.

"We definitely had a chance to win the Lafayette match, but we came out slow," Helt said. "We didn't play as tough as we had hoped to."

The matches against Navy and American earlier in the week weren't any easier for the Bison as they were shut out in both.

"I was fairly pleased with how we competed," Helt said. "Their lineup just outmatched our lineup."

The women face Colgate at 10 a.m tomorrow at home, and the men also play at home against Army at noon tomorrow.

Jaclyn Carr—The Bucknellian

Rheanna Gaskin '06 returns a serve in a recent match against Lafayette. Gaskin defeated Lisa Fung-Kee-Fung 6-1, 6-2. With her win, Gaskin helped the team improve to 9-1 overall in league.

Lacrosse continues undefeated P.L. run

By Pat Evans

The 19th-ranked Bison men's lacrosse team edged out league rival Hobart 8-7 at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium Saturday to continue the team's undefeated Patriot League run and put the Bison in prime position to win the conference, earning a bid to the NCAA Tournament. The win avenges last year's loss to Hobart, who beat the Orange and Blue out in league tie breaker, ruining the Bison's chance of entering the national tournament .

With the score tied at seven with just 1 minute 11 seconds remaining, Andrew Copelan '03 dodged down the left sideline and put one in over Mike Borzs' head to win the game.

"I didn't have that much time to think about, but I knew that he was expecting me to shoot low," Copelan said. "It was pretty much instinctive and I'm just glad it worked out."

The game was a defensive showcase and the Bison, who were ranked fourth in the nation in scoring defense, allowing only 6.5 goals a game, got the best of the Statesmen this time. Justin Sussman '03 was phenomenal in goal, tallying 16 saves for a career total of 502, a statistic that ranks him fifth all-time among University goalies.

"They're a high-powered offense," Sussman said. "It's a great testament to our defense that we were able to limit their shots and stop them."

Bombs and baseballs: the birth of the partnership between war and sports

Cecily Cairns

Soldiers pass the time playing baseball during World War I. Even with explosions in the horizan, there was room for America's pastime.

Over the course of the past two weeks, war has been a dominant theme in most domains of the country's media. Sports media has certainly not been an exception to that. The recent declaration of war, and before that, the possibility of it, prompted many sportswriters and reporters to rifle through the history books and find a way to solidify the connection between sport and war.

The connection is easy to see, but hard to explain. War is a life-and-death situation and sports are merely a form of entertainment, so why do they look to each other for support, for inspiration and as a means to formulate analogies? Athletics and the military share their respective sets of terminology, after all.

But really, do bombs and baseballs belong in the same article? Do boxing gloves and bayonets have any grounds for comparison?

It's a bit of a stretch, but there's certainly a historical relationship that merits attention. Sports and war aren't the same thing—to make such a claim would be beyond exaggeration. But they did grow up together.

The decade that directly followed the First World War, the 1920s, showcased a dramatic transformation of spectator sports. It marked the birth of the great American sports hero, a prototype that has persisted through a century.

At the turn of the century, before World War I disillusioned the nation, there was a push to create what intellectuals referred to as a "sporting republic," a Utopian society where athletics provided a healthy alternative to combat and an outlet for the fighting spirit. But sports were a divided entity—the games played by the elite members of the nation were of an entirely different brand of athletics than those that cropped up in the grubbier elements of society. Victorian principles hesitated to accept athletics as having any place in the moral society, while many shunned ethnic groups found sports to be an outlet for frustration and a means for pleasure in an otherwise dismal existence.

In short, the world of athletics, in its budding stages of adolescence, was going through an identity crisis. It was probably the last part of American life that ought to have been a candidate for the driving impetus towards the nation's unification.

In 1910, a fellow named William James—a philosopher and advocate of social progression—thought otherwise, though, and penned a proposition entitled "The Moral Equivalent of War." War, according to James, was a great means to social unification.

The military's discipline and strenuousness proved to be an indispensable perpetuator of honor, morality and adherence to a social code or law. It showcased and strengthened the cause of such virtues as courage, physical prowess. And in those years, before patriotism was declared passé, war had the potential to thrust a common goal in front of the rich, the poor and the few in between, to turn them all towards the same flag.

Of course, James realized that wherever war is concerned, atrocity is sure to follow. He postulated, with admirable optimism, that athletics could stand in for combat and soon he had enlisted a slew of intellectuals to stand behind him on the fervid claim that participation in athletics could bolster the common virtues needed to hold together the nation.

Athletics were held parallel to the construct of the nation, providing a stand-in for the unifying qualities of war. James' "moral equivalent" didn't spread terribly far from the elite proponents of the plan. It didn't get the chance.

By the time the lofty plan had trickled into a wider span of social classes, Europe had run amuck, and the United States eventually plunged into the fray. War no longer needed an "equivalent," moral or otherwise, and James' hopes needed redefinition.

The sporting republic was no more.

The appeal of sports had spread just enough, though, that it lingered on in the wake of World War I's outbreak. Athletics did, as the masses discovered, have a certain way of pointing human energy in a progressive direction, both in the military and in the war-torn society.

Suddenly sports found a place in the armed services. They provided a healthy distraction for soldiers—rather than vices like alcohol and prostitutes—to direct their energy toward. In addition, athletics cultivated and fueled the soldier's competitive nature and will to win, not to mention his physical fitness and mental preparedness.

War Secretary Newton Baker strongly encouraged the implementation of athletics as a part of the military, establishing the War Department's Commission of Training Camp Activities, which worked with the YMCA to involve enlisted men in a variety of athletic programs. Troops were often entrusted to the YMCA, which established intercompany leagues and aided in the effort to keep soldiers fit for battle.

Physical efficiency and the sporting spirit suddenly became paramount in the nation's effort towards unity and strength. James Naismith and Walter Camp lectured both the military and the public on the importance of athletic fitness and its impact on the war.

By March of 1918, compulsitory athletics in war training were proposed, and physical directors were deployed to France by the YMCA to instruct troops in various athletic approaches to fighting. Wrestling, boxing, gymnastics and even baseball-throwing were used as methods for combat instruction and general strengthening.

Sport became not only a strengthening agent for the country's fighters, but also an outlet and a distraction from the ugliness they were faced with on a daily basis. Baker was so accommodating to this need that for three years, he had the World Series broadcast to American troops. The day before the United States launched an attack on the German St. Mihiel salient, American soldiers in various posts around the world listened to the Boston Red Sox beat the Chicago Cubs in the only World Series ever completed in September—the last World Series won by the Red Sox.

The military function of sport eventually sparked a public appreciation—a unified public appreciation—for athletics. Sports that had once been shunned by "higher society" and restricted to filthy barrooms and back alleys suddenly found a platform where they could gain respect from intellectuals and factory workers alike.

Boxing, a sport banned in many states prior to the war, became more than just a fitness drill for the military, as soldiers used it as a daily respite from the monotony of training. The public's respect for the military allowed a general respect for boxing to develop across the United States. By the close of the war, most states had legalized the sport, and boxing became one of the most popular and highly attended spectator sports in the following era, drawing crowds that included politicians and celebrities.

Military football exhibitions opened up the game to non-collegiate audiences, allowing appreciation for the sport to spread to more socially expansive crowds. The rise in popularity of non-college football competition gave a much-needed boost to the floundering American Professional Football Conference, which climbed out of the onerous shadow of college football to become the National Football League in 1922.

As they were for the soldiers, sports became a healthy distraction from the horror of war for the common man. The public, weary of the grim realities of battle, found the ideal escape from it in the grand and romantic stories of great athletes and their odysseys on the playing fields. Sports were a reason to believe in the American Dream in the face of great adversity.

The power of sports was permanently stamped on American society. When the fighting ended in 1919, it left a strapping public appreciation for sports in its aftermath, setting the stage for what eventually became known as The Golden Age of Sports.

The relationship between sports and war has endured through all of the social tumult that has rolled through the nation since its early functions in military and social functions. Writers and reporters tend to focus on the loss that war has incurred on sports, from Christy Mathewson's demise to the depletion of major-league baseball during World War II.

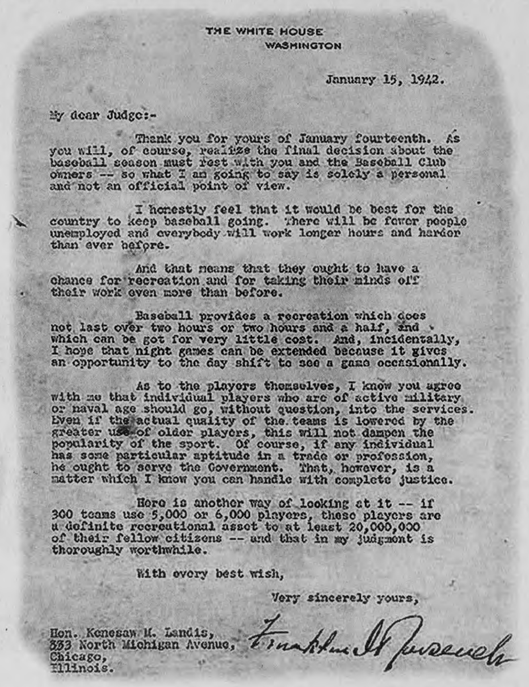
Historical literature offers a more multidimensional interaction between military and athletics throughout the U.S. history.

Sports, in both the participatory and spectator forms, had the excitement and innocent drama to boost the morale of soldiers. Conversely, the heroes of war offered the kind of national pride—dedication to freedom and the will to defeat anyone who threatened the fabric of their morals—that great athletes sought to mimic, albeit on a drastically smaller scale, in their quest for greatness on the playing fields.

There may not be any trenches or barbed-wire barriers cutting across the manicured green fields of the baseball diamond, nor are there any umpires stepping between melees on the battlefields of war, but sports and war can still claim an intimate relationship, much of which was born almost a century ago during the First World War.

The athlete and the soldier were, and still are, a similar breed, fueled to protect integrity, programmed to do anything but lie down in the face of attack.

Hopefully, for the sake of America, that won't change anytime soon.



THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

January 15, 1942.

My dear Judge:-

Thank you for yours of January fourteenth. As you will, of course, realize the final decision about the baseball season must rest with you and the baseball Club owners -- so what I am going to say is solely a personal and not an official point of view.

I honestly feel that it would be best for the country to keep baseball going. There will be fewer people unemployed and everybody will work longer hours and harder than ever before.

And that means that they ought to have a chance for recreation and for taking their minds off their work even more than before.

Baseball provides a recreation which does not last over two hours or two hours and a half, and which can be got for very little cost. And, incidentally, I hope that night games can be extended because it gives an opportunity to the day shift to see a game occasionally.

As to the players themselves, I know you agree with me that individual players who are of active military or naval age should go, without question, into the services. Even if the actual quality of the teams is lowered by the greater use of older players, this will not dampen the popularity of the sport. Of course, if any individual has some particular aptitude in a trade or profession, he ought to serve the Government. That, however, is a matter which I know you can handle with complete justice.

Here is another way of looking at it -- if 300 teams use 5,000 or 6,000 players, these players are a definite recreational asset to at least 20,000,000 of their fellow citizens -- and that in my judgment is thoroughly worthwhile.

With every best wish,

Very sincerely yours,

Franklin D. Roosevelt

Hon. Kenesaw M. Landis,
333 North Michigan Avenue,
Chicago,
Illinois.

Sports and war: a timeline

1700—The colonies' troops use martial arts to condition for battle. Soldiers also hold competitions in wrestling, foot races, jumping, horse races and shooting.

1770—Thomas Jefferson condemns sports as an "indulgence" of the European upper class, and demands that the new nation avoid them. George Washington ignores the demands and encourages troops in the Continental Army to engage in athletics for entertainment. The troops enjoy games similar to bowling, cricket and European-style football.

1860—Large groups of young men in the Civil War turn to sports as an escape from the boredom of an all-male environment. They entertain themselves with baseball, running, wrestling, shooting and boxing. Prizefighters serving in the war put on fights for soldiers to watch and bet on. Despite the popularity of the sport among soldiers, boxing still declines in post-bellum era, as it continues to be shunned by upper classes. The aftermath of the war also allows black Americans to participate in several organized sports, albeit in segregated leagues. One of the most notable influences this has is on baseball, as all-black leagues begin to form.

World War I set the stage for the "golden age" of boxing.

1917—American troops undergo rigorous athletic conditioning coordinated by the YMCA during World War I, and also turn to sports as an outlet for the troublesome nature of war. See "Bombs and baseballs" article.

1925—Christy Mathewson, the New York Giants pitcher who invented the "fadeaway" (screwball) among other pitches and revolutionized the art of pitching, dies at age 45 of tuberculosis, which he suffered from as a result of gas exposure during training for World War I.

1936—Nazi Germany shuns American Jesse Owens because his talent and race threaten their goals of Aryan supremacy, but Owens refuses to be held down by Hitler's credo. Owens ties the 100-yard Olympic record in his first race of the day, and proceeds to win four gold medals in Berlin. In 1990, Owens is awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for his "triumph for all humanity."

1942—Baseball heroes like Ted Williams, Yogi Berra and Bob Feller enlist and head to war to defend our country. President Franklin Roosevelt composes a letter to Commissioner Kenesaw Landis stressing the importance of baseball in keeping the spirit of Americans high. The letter encourages Landis to let the games go on. Baseball continues in the absence of some of its biggest stars. Among those who stay behind to entertain fans is a young Stan Musial, whose career is just starting when the war begins depleting baseball's ranks. While American heroes like Williams fight for the country, ballplayers who stay home also pitch in by keeping the morale of American citizens up. "I honestly feel that it would be best for the country to keep baseball going," Roosevelt writes in his letter. See letter, below left.

1943—Philip Wrigley, answering to fears that baseball will shut down because of players lost to World War II service, creates the All-American Girls Softball League, which became the All-American Girls Baseball League. The league is an integral part of the advancement of women's sports.

1967—Muhammed Ali refuses to serve the country in the Vietnam War, dodging the draft for religious reasons. He is convicted of violating the Selective Services Act.

1970—Bob Kalsu of the Buffalo Bills becomes the only U.S. professional athlete to die in combat during the Vietnam War. According to a 2001 Sports Illustrated article, only seven professional athletes serve in Vietnam: six football players and one bowler.

1976—In the wake of the Vietnam War, protestors jump into the outfield at Dodger Stadium and unfurl an American flag that they intend to burn. Outfielder Rick Monday flies over to the flag-burners, rips the flag out from under the impending flame and carries it to safety. Monday gets a standing ovation from a patriotic crowd—and is greeted affectionately in every stadium he plays in throughout the season—for his thwarting of the anti-American gesture. The flag rescue is immortalized in a Pulitzer Prize-nominated photograph by James Roark.

1980—The U.S. Olympic hockey team, composed of young amateurs, upsets the Soviet hockey team for the gold medal in the Lake Placid Olympics. The tremendous effort came during Cold War unrest between the two nations. The game was not only a victory for the hockey team, but was widely considered a victory for all of America. The stars and stripes are everywhere as fans chanted "U.S.A.!"

2001—Terrorist attacks on Sept. 11 shake the nation. The sports world shuts down as Americans divert their attention to more important matters. Major-league baseball halted play for a week, the National Football League postponed its second week of games and four PGA events are canceled, in addition to countless competitions of college sports, NASCAR, the NHL, the NBA and horse racing. As the dust settles, Americans turn to sports as an escape from the horror of the attacks and use ballparks as a platform to express their patriotism. When baseball resumes play, fans tote flags to stadiums everywhere, "God Bless America" replaces "Take Me Out To The Ballgame" in the seventh inning stretch and spectators erupt into chants of "U.S.A.!" The national anthem takes on a new meaning for fans and athletes.

2002—Pat Tillman, formerly an Arizona Cardinals safety, turns down a $3.6 million contract and enlists in the U.S. Army to become a Ranger. His decision and sacrifice are admired by fans and fellow athletes alike.

2003—Toni Smith, a basketball player at Division III Manhattanville College creates a ruckus when she refuses to face our nation's flag in protest of the war on Iraq. She is greeted with boos and chants of "U.S.A." during road games and also garners criticism from other athletes including Mike Piazza and other members of the New York Mets.

2003—ESPN.com's SportsNation sets up an e-mail correspondence program entitled "Jocks to GIs" allowing American soldiers to chat with sports stars such as Tiger Woods, Shaquille O'Neal and Mark Prior. Over 20 athletes volunteered to participate, eager to assist the troops by boosting their morale.

Ted Williams:

A baseball legend, an American hero

BY BRENT BUTLER
Sports Editor

Last year, when Ted Williams passed away, sports fans throughout the world were reminded of perhaps the greatest hitter in major-league baseball history.

We were reminded of his amazing 1941 season where he became the last man in history to hit .400 on a season. We were reminded of his 1939 Rookie of the Year Award, his Triple Crown and his MVP award in 1949, but what we were not reminded of was the courage and bravery which he displayed by enlisting in the Naval Air Corps in May of 1942.

After having such an amazing season in 1941, Williams showed his true character by entering the ranks of the military in order to fight for his country during World War II. He never saw combat in WWII—the war in the Pacific ended before he got there, but he never felt bad about his decision to give up three years of his career to serve his country.

"I could never resent the three years I spent in World War II," Williams said according to ESPN.com. "Not that I did anything, but the very fact that everybody was in the service or doing something—never regretted those years. I was proud of those years. I was happy that it happened that way."

Today, when the youth of America look up to its sports heroes, they see athletes like Michael Irving, O.J. Simpson, Randy Moss, Daryl Strawberry and Allen Iverson as their supposed "role models." Unfortunately, America's youth does not have a role model like Ted Williams to look up to in this day and age.

Today's stars like Kobe Bryant and LeBron James didn't go to college in order to continue their athletic careers, but after high school Williams signed with a minor-league team in order to play in his hometown of Sand Diego, Calif. After just a year and a half of playing for the minor leagues, Williams was aquired by the Red Sox in a trade for five players as well as $25,000, and just one year later he was called up to "the big show," the major leagues.

When Williams started his rookie season for the Red Sox he was only 20 years old, but he impressed everyone by batting .327 with 31 home runs and 145 runs batted in in his first season. Those statistics we good enough to earn Williams the honor of being the 1939 Rookie of the Year.

After his impressive rookie season, Williams continued his dominance of opposing pitchers throughout the 1940 season and on into the 1941 season.

Williams' 1941 season was one that every baseball player dreams of, a slugging percentage of .735 and an overall batting average of .406. During the 1941 season it seemed as if nothing could go wrong for Williams.

"Everything I hit fell in. Every break that I could get I got," Williams said according to Tedwilliams.com.

Throughout the season, Williams was at record-setting pace, hitting well over .400 for the majority of the season, until the last few weeks of play in the regular season.

"It was the first time it worried me whether I was going to hit .400 or not, because the papers were writing it up," Williams said according to Tedwilliams.com.

Going into the final day of the regular season, the last day satistics would be counted, Williams was posted at .3996 batting average for the season.

After the first game of the double-header Williams proved that he was one of the greatest hitters in history by going six for eight on the day, safely securing a .406 batting average on the year.

This was the last time in major-league history that a player has obtained a .400 batting average on the year, which is an amzing feat to accomplish. One would think that after such an amazing year, nothing could stop an athlete of this caliber, but after this great season Williams decided to support his country instead of his team the following year.

When the World War II started, Williams enlisted in the Naval Air Corporations, while he didn't see action before the war in the Pacific was over, he still gained valuble experience which helped him in his futur military career.

During the Korean War he served again, flying as John Glenn's wingman in an F-9. He flew 39 missions in the war, and survived after being hit by anti-aircraft fire and being forced to crash land. The next day, Williams was back in the air.

Williams lost almost five full seasons serving his country in both Korea and World War II. Many other athletes served in the two wars but Williams has truly become the prime example of the American sports war hero.

MLB 2003: A Look into the Crystal Ball

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

With the major-league-baseball season just underway, I want to take this opportunity to make my fearless predictions on the upcoming season.

National League East:

The NL East will rival the AL West for the strongest division this year. The Braves, Mets, Phillies and Marlins—if their young pitching staff matures quickly—all have a legitimate shot at winning the division. In the end this will be the year that the Braves' reign atop the NL East will end, due to a much weaker pitching staff. Jim Thome, Pat Burrell and Randy Wolf will all have career seasons, leading the Phillies to the division crown. The Mets will not underachieve this season and will get the wild card under new manager Art Howe.

National League Central:

The St. Louis Cardinals have quietly been one of the most consistent teams in baseball over the past few years. I look for the Cardinals to have another very solid year behind Scott Rolen, who will have a very productive season in his first full season with the Cardinals. In the end, the Cardinals will come up just short to the Chicago Cubs. Mark Prior and Kerry Wood will perform on the same level as Randy Johnson and Curt Schilling and will form a dominant one-two punch that will carry the Cubbies into October.

National League West:

The Arizona Diamondbacks will battle the San Francisco Giants until the last day of the season for the NL West title. In the end, the D-Backs will take the prize, because pitching wins championships. Johnson and Schilling will overwhelm opponents down the stretch. The Giants have a threatening offense this season with Ray Durham and Edgardo Alfonzo added to support Barry Bonds, but are lacking in talent and depth on the mound, which will prove costly.

American League East:

OK, time to pencil in the Yankees for their sixth straight division title, right? Wrong! All signs this spring point to a Yankees collapse. The clubhouse has been filled with distractions—George Steinbrenner and Derek Jeter have been in disagreement and David Wells admitted that alcohol is his secret pitch. The Yankees are still a potent team, and it will take a great season by a division rival to dethrone them. I see Boston having that great season and dethroning the Yanks, as long as Pedro Martinez and the rest of the pitching staff stay healthy.

American League Central:

The AL Central will be the weakest division this year, and it will be up for grabs among Cleveland, Minnesota and Chicago. Most people are giving the Indians no shot this season, but they have a chance if rookies Travis Hafner and Brandon Phillips turn out to be as good as the "experts" say they will. In the end, though, the Indians will be no better than a .500 team. The Twins have the pitching to make a run for the division title, but will come up just short to the White Sox. Chicago has quietly developed a potent lineup with players like Frank Thomas, Joe Crede, Magglio Ordonez and Paul Konerko. The addition of Bartolo Colon to the pitching rotation will be just enough for the White Sox to beat Minnesota for the title.

American League West:

Three of the best teams in baseball, Seattle, Oakland and Anaheim are in the AL West. Undoubtedly, the AL's wild card will come from this division. I see Oakland winning the division thanks to the best trio of starting pitchers in baseball (Tim Hudson, Barry Zito and Mark Mulder). Anaheim, the defending champs, will take the wild card through a strong, power-hitting lineup. The Mariners will be left at home come October due to a much weaker pitching staff.

National League Playoffs:

The Phillies will beat the Cubs in four games. The Mets will upset the Diamondbacks in five games, setting up the New Jersey Turnpike NLCS. The Phillies and Mets will take the NLCS to game seven, with the Phillies prevailing.

American League Playoffs:

The Red Sox will dethrone the Angels in five games. The A's will blow the White Sox out in three games. In the ALCS, the "Curse of the Bambino" will live on with the A's beating the Red Sox in six games.

World Series:

The Phillies will (mercifully) close Veterans Stadium on top after one of the most exciting World Series in history. It will be a crazy scene at the Vet, as Pat Burrell hits a home run in the 12th inning of game seven to give the Phillies the championship. The fans will save the demolition crew some work, as they celebrate by taking home with them any piece of the Vet they can pick up as a victory souvenir.

F-balling

It's that time of the year again: that time when armchair athletes flex their statistical muscles, neglect the small piece of tomato wedged between their bicuspids for a week and 30-somethings promise their parents they'll be down for dinner only to immediately dismiss the vow as they check the rumor mill to find someone has offered Marlon Byrd for Kevin Brown … straight up. Now tell me, is there any greater season than Fantasy Baseball season?

With it's humble beginnings in small-town America when two brain-dead yokels got together for some Handi-Snacks and Yoohoo and drew IOUs on the back of cardboard bubble-gum sticks to complete a trade between Ty "Georgia Peach" Cobb and Rowland Glen "Rollie" Fingers, fantasy baseball has certainly become a cult phenomenon. More likely, the origin of this now-famous art form (yes, art form) has its roots in baseball card trading.

Today, fantasy baseball is so pervasive that every major news and sports service has fantasy coverage, emphasizing best "bang-for-your-buck" players and draft day tips complete with interactive flash menus, stat finders and the obligatory Penthouse subscription forms.

Since I set my draft order I've been subscribed to four "art" magazines, three online pornography services, signed up for three dating services and found my long lost middle school romance—her name is Ethel and she graduated just after Dewey beat Truman. It's a phenomenal advertising strategy—prey on the weak, desperate "table-for-one-ers" who surf the Web like it were Wax City.

Regardless, those who have been lucky enough to penetrate the inner circle of fantasy baseballing are the diehard statheads and sad social miscues who spend their coffee breaks searching for nearby Internet cafés to scrutinize the waiver wire for the catch of the day, no pun intended.

These unfortunate Faustian sycophants stop at nothing to acquire a healthy balance of surefire vets and non-risky rookies. Outside of the cyber-world, these people take fashion advice from Kenny (not G) and relationship advice from Miss Cleo. For all their knowledge of windows, it's surprising how little they must look out them.

Those less devoted to the art manage to live their public lives fairly unscathed by the puffy, sagging bags formed under bloodshot irises that mark the F-baller initiated like a Maori tribal marking, but inside they're a raging maelstrom of angst and discontent because their recent trade of Bobby Higginson for Kazuhisa Ishii was vetoed by the league.

These lucky ones are closet F-ballers and can live their lives without the intense scrutiny of their peers because they possess minimal observable tells like a Mississippi gambler at a high school poker match.

The sad fact is fantasy baseball is a disease. It operates similar to the AIDS virus, attacking friends and family members who try to intervene (helper T cells) and inevitably corrupt them until the rotisserie league can't support them anymore and the tears start flowing.

The only cure for F-ball syndrome is to hope a first-tier shortstop or catcher goes down with an injury. There's nothing more sobering for the diehard F-baller than having a gaping hole in their infield. When Derek Jeter went down with a shoulder separation in the Yankees' season opener, the collective cry from one-eighth (or one-tenth, depending on the size of your league) of the population was enough to cause massive electrical storms on earth that the top minds in America mistakenly claim was caused by a project to control the weather, and the only way to save the earth from annihilation is to send a team of crack scientists and cowboys into the core of the earth … but F-ballers know the truth … it's all about the hot spot.

So if you're not in the loop and happen to come across a lazy-eyed, hooded, bespectacled doughboy staring through a loop at the Dodgers' box scores in the Times on a Monday afternoon, understand that he is that thing that you smell, and that he probably hasn't spoken to people outside of the virtual message postings in three years … and I'm single, too.

Interview with Richard Alexander

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

Bucknell track and field teams opened their outdoor seasons on March 22 at the Retriever Invitational at University of Maryland Baltimore County. The teams trained through the meet so the results weren't outstanding, but the meet gave a many athletes their first chance of the year to compete in their events.

The Bison took full advantage of their first chance at the outdoor-only events by placing well in the hammer throw, javelin, high hurdles, 400-meter hurdles and 3000-meter steeplechase on the track.

Richard Alexander '03, a team captain and one of the Bison's top hurdlers, got his first chance of the season to run the 110 high hurdles and 400-meter hurdles.

We caught up with Alexander to find out what it takes to be a hurdler, a leader and what his outlook for the Bison is this year.

Bucknellian: You had a pretty good indoor season. To what do you attribute your success?

Alexander: I believe that my season has been successful for a number of reasons. I have been hurdling now at the collegiate level for four years and I believe that just with experience I have gotten better.

[Associate Head] Coach [Joeseph] Klim has done some things with me technically that have helped to improve my form and thus my time. The workouts this year have been good at getting me doing more things. The team helps me out a lot. I have other hurdlers around me pushing me as I am trying to push them. Another thing that I believe helped, even though I would have rather it not happen, was the fact that I hurt my knee early in the season. This caused me to simply focus on hurdles, instead of running other races. I believe this focusing helped me out.

Bucknellian: What kind of physical qualities does it take to be a hurdler?

A hurdler should have some speed, but they don't have to be the fastest runner in the world; form is more important. A slower runner with good form will be just as good as, if not better than, the faster runner with worse form.
—Richard Alexander '03

Alexander: A hurdler should have some speed, but they don't have to be the fastest runner in the world; form is more important. A slower runner with good form will be just as good as, if not better than, the faster runner with worse form. I am a short hurdler at 5 feet 8 inches, typically you want a taller person around 6 feet or so. It also takes flexibility because without that height you will have problems getting over the hurdles.

Bucknellian: What about mentally, what's it take there?

Alexander: Mentally the biggest thing is getting over the fear of the hurdlers. Most hurdlers, when they start are afraid of falling or hitting the hurdle, and that is something that you just have to get over. You also must mentally be able to run your race. When you start trying to run the race of others you get into knocking the hurdlers down and running with poor form.

Bucknellian: What is your role as a captain of the team?

Alexander: Most people joke about my role as captain as being the cheerleading captain. I am often the one that people look at when they want to get a cheer started. I just want to do whatever it takes to make the team closer and more poised at winning some meets and performing well.

Bucknellian: What are your individual goals for your final season?

Alexander: My individual goal for this outdoor season is to be a Patriot League Champion. Last year I finished second in the 110 meter high hurdlers and this year I hope to improve that. I would also like to place high in the 400 meter IM hurdles.

Bucknellian: What about team goals?

Alexander: I would love for us to win the Patriot League Championship, but if that cannot happen I would like for us to redeem ourselves from what happened indoors and take back the No. 2 spot from Lafayette. I would like us to also get a little bit closer to Army to restore some confidence that may have been lost over the past couple years.

Bucknellian: I've got to ask, what's with the headband? You love that thing!

Alexander: The headband kind of started when I was a sophomore and us African-American males on the team decided to start our own fraternity known as N.O.T.T. (Negros On the Track Team). We had joked about doing many things like making T-shirts and stuff like that.

On the way to indoor leagues my junior year, we stopped at a mall and I saw these orange headbands and was like we should get some of these. So I bought orange headbands for the three members at the time: Micah, Noel and myself, just as a joke. We all wore them at the indoor leagues and we all had pretty good days and decided to keep doing it. Now we have new headbands for this outdoor season and we have even gotten the freshmen some. So I guess the legacy will continue. Plus they just look cool with the speedsuits.

Bucknellian: Your love for track has sparked you to look to get into coaching when you graduate. Can you talk about why you are interested in this?

Alexander: I have been interested in coaching for quite awhile now. I just enjoy the sport of track and field and would like to help others to enjoy it, too. I believe that I have always been pretty good at teaching people things and helping them to understand things, so I figured why not try doing this in a setting where I feel the most comfortable, that being on the track.

Track and field teams head to Colonial Relays this weekend

McKnight throwing far. He had a rough year last year and has worked very hard this year."

McKnight was satisfied with his performance, but optimistic about his chances to improve.

"I think consistent training and some more competition will help my distances increase. I was impressed with the quality of the meet, especially with the caliber of throwers. They were some of the best I've seen since I've been in college," McKnight said.

The men's sprint relays also impressed Donner, as the men nearly broke 42 in the 4x100 meter relay.

"Our men's 4x100 and 4x200 looked very good. We need to clean up some handoffs, but the running was great."

McKnight is optimistic despite a relay disqualification and botched handoff by some his teammates.

"There were some costly mistakes, but I'm sure all the kinks will be worked out by the time leagues and IC4As come around," McKnight said.

A number of the mid-distance and distance runners had good races as well.

"I was pleased with our men's 4x800 of [Lou] Palma ['03], [Eric] Furst ['03], [Kevin] Walsh ['04] and [Ted] Evans ['03], as 7:44 is our fastest time of the year," Donner said. "We needed some middle distance runners to step it up and Walsh and Evans did so. At Susquehanna I was very impressed with [Marcus] Jones ['04] and [Kevin] Fortkiewicz ['06] in the 5000. Those were breakthrough races for both of them," Donner said.

The breakthrough for Jones could be attributed two ways.

"The short answer would be Hatorade, but I think two years of staying pretty healthy under Coach Donner's training finally paid off," Jones said.

The team is hopeful its work will pay off in the long run.

"I thought the guys at Susquehanna performed really well. Some people performed well at Raleigh but I think some of the guys were disappointed. It's still really early in the season and a lot of guys were competing in their primary events for the first time this season. I would imagine that after a week of adjusting you will see some big personal records from the rest of the team at Colonial Relays," Jones said. "I think the team just needs to remain positive. There have been a lot of people who have had some big personal bests this year but we just need to be more consistent and get healthy. If we all perform up to our capability at the same meet then we are going to be a tough team to beat."

Donner is looking forward to the upcoming meet at William and Mary.

"Colonial Relays is always a special meet for Bucknell. Bucknell has been to this meet every single year. We will try to score as many points as we can without sacrificing what our long-term goal is, and that's to place high at Patriot Leagues," Donner said.

Waterpolo reaches .500

The Bison women's water polo team knocked off home team Villanova 11-10 to even its overall record at 10-10 and improve its league record to 5-3. The game at Villanova was part of a four game league trip for the Bison, who went 2-2 on the weekend, losing to George Washington 8-7, Princeton 11-2 and beating Salem 12-1.

Katie Stahler '03 scored five goals for the Bison in the win over Villanova for a game in which the Bison's steady offensive output was too much for the Wildcats to handle.

"We responded well to a very fired up home team and never let them get on top of us."
*—Head Coach John Ziegler

"We responded well to a very fired up home team and never let them get on top of us," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

Stahler gives the credit for her critical five goals to her teammates who were to feed the ball to the middle of the pool on offense, creating opportunities for the captain.

"I got some really great passes from my team," Stahlen said. "We worked the ball around on offense in a way that let me capitalize on open shots."

The first game of the four-game trip against George Washington was a bit disappointing for the Bison who had defeated the Colonials 11-10 earlier in the season. Sophomore Katie Hartigan's three goals were not enough for the Bison. The team started the game off down 3-1 and was never able to get back on track.

"I didn't feel like we played our best game. We played inconsistently, which was disappointing," Zeigler said.

The Bison responded to the loss well, coming back and pummeling Salem 12-1. Nine different players scored in the game.

"I challenged the team to start playing more aggressively and to utilize our strengths," Zeigler said. "I think we used the first loss to motivate us."

The next game against Princeton proved to be more challenging as the Bison fell to the national powerhouse 11-2. Despite the loss there were some bright points taken away for the team.

"We held them to only three goals in the second half, which was a really big deal for us," goalie Lindsay Chesterfield '03 said.

The Bison feel like they can compete with teams like Princeton if they play on top of their game.

"We struggled to put away some good offensive opportunities," Zeigler said. It really could have been a lot closer if we had done that."

The Bison are confident in the outlook of the rest of the season. The team will be seeded fourth and will open up with Harvard in this weekend's ECAC Tournament. Later in the season at Southern Championships they will have an opportunity to settle the score with George Washington, a team which they have split their games this season.

"We've been inconsistent in some games, but we've been able to iron out some kinks and get ready for the championships," Stahler said.

19th-ranked men's lacrosse team edges out Patriot League rival Hobart 8-7

Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

The lacrosse team gathers for a huddle at Christy-Mathewson Memorial Stadium. The team beat Patriot League rival Hobart 8-7.

Blaise Fletcher '04 and Brian Goodman '05 were key for the Bison defensively. Fletcher stifled all-league attackman, John Bogosian, holding the league's leading scorer to just one shot on goal the entire game. Goodman dominated the all-important faceoff category, earning him the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week award, which is now the third straight week the Bison have captured the honor.

"I knew Bogosian was going to get something, but my goal going in was just to stop him as much as I could," Fletcher said. "Our coaches did a good job helping to show me what his tendencies were when we watched film the week going into the game."

The Bison go into every season expecting to win the league and enter the NCAA Tournament, but last year's disappointing loss to Hobart didn't allow them to do so. The team looked at this year's game as a chance to show that they were the better team and that this year would not be the same as last.

"Last year they ate us alive in the faceoff category, which was the key to their beating us," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "This year Goodman was an absolute warrior. Not only did he neutralize them, he gave us a significant advantage in that spot."

Also critical for the experienced Bison team that boasts nine starting seniors was the play of the underclassmen who had to step up for the biggest game of the season.

"At halftime I asked the midfield reserves to go in there and get it done," Jamieson said. "Our starting midfield can't take the whole game on their shoulders because the emotional drain in a game like this doesn't let you play the whole time. Our reserves went in there and did a terrific job."

One of those players was Patrick O'Hearn '05 who hadn't scored a goal all season until one of the most critical junctures of the season. With 8:33 remaining in the fourth quarter the sophomore received a pass from Andrew Sanders '03 and skipped a shot past the goalie to tie the game at 6.

Rob Lane '03 also stepped up big for the Bison scoring two critical goals including the go-ahead one to put his team up 7-6. This lead did not last long as a Bison penalty set up Hobart's tying goal.

After Copelan's goal with 1:11 remaining, the Bison were able to hang on for the win as Sussman stopped a Hobart shot and cleared the ball outside of the defense.

For the Bison seniors the win was a great way to end four years of battling it out with the league rival, especially considering last year's result.

"It was just a great whole-team effort," Copelan said. "The defense played remarkably and we were able to hold on. It's nice, as a senior, to avenge last year's loss."

Hobart is a successful lacrosse program that at one time won 11 straight national championships. The school puts a lot of effort into making sure that year in and year out it is among the top schools in the nation in the sport that has come to define it. While the Bison program is arguably just emerging onto the national scene with its recent domination of the Patriot League, it is an exciting result when schools of this caliber match up.

"That was as good as it gets for college lacrosse," Jamieson said. "The game had interest, excitement, tremendous skills and a great respect for the game. There wasn't a lot of trash talking out there that you usually see."

While the win was huge for Bison program success this season and seasons to come, the team realizes that it has a way to go before it accomplishes its goal of winning the league and entering the NCAA Tournament. Army, a team that is among the favorites to win the league and that always gives the Bison trouble with its relentless play, still remains on the schedule and the Bison know that they can't let this win make them overconfident.

"I still feel like we have something to prove," Sussman said. "It's not even close to being over. We're on our way and we have a lot of momentum, but we still have a lot to do."

Jamieson echoes those sentiments, knowing that the season would be a disappointment if his team didn't use the win to propel it to where it wants to be.

"We're only as good as our next practice and next game we play," Jamieson said. "We have to line up and play knowing that other teams are looking to knock us off now."

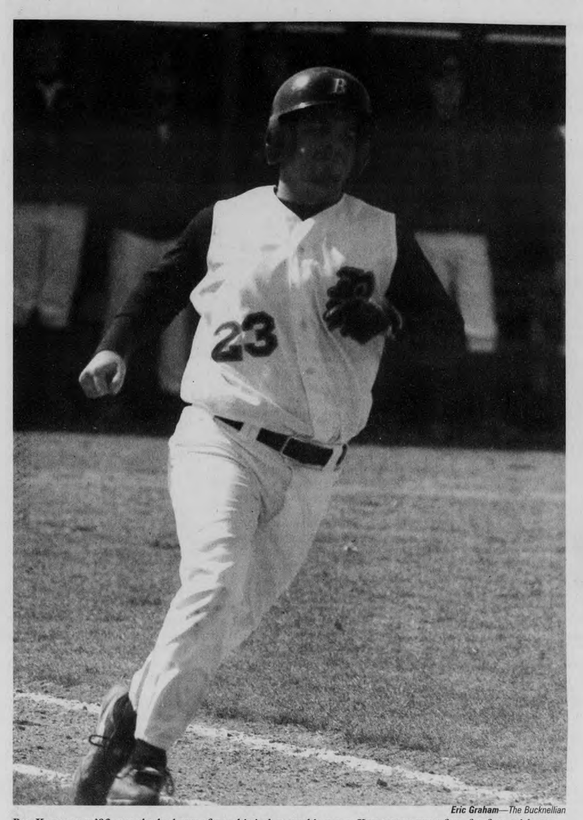
Bison swept their first Patriot League doubleheader of 2003



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Ben Krentzman '03 rounds the bases after a hit in last week's game. Krentzman went four for four with two RBIs on March 31 against Holy Cross. Bucknell took three out of four games in the series.

"In order to duplicate those results every weekend, we're going to have to eliminate some mental mistakes and learn to put teams away instead of letting them hang around and allowing them the opportunity to beat us in the late innings," Grant said.

That resiliency was certainly evident during the first doubleheader in the series at Holy Cross, which took place on Saturday. Both games saw the Bison come out on top in intense but precarious contests, each one-run decisions that came down to the seventh inning.

The Bison jumped to a 1-0 lead in the first inning of game one when Day hit a single to drive home Stoll, who had walked and reached second on Moss's sacrifice ground out.

Holy Cross retaliated in the second with a triple and a sacrifice fly to even the score at 1-1, but Bucknell jumped right back on top in the third. Stoll singled and advanced to second on another Moss sacrifice, but was picked off by Holy Cross's pitcher. Day gave the Bison another baserunner when he singled up the middle, and Hirschberg smashed his second triple of the season, scoring Day and giving the Bison a 2-1 lead.

Both starting pitchers stifled the offense for the next two-and-a-half innings, until Holy Cross' Drew Bigda knocked out a three-run home run, giving the Crusaders a 4-2 lead going into the seventh.

The Bison were far from finished, as they rallied in the top of the seventh with three scores of their own. A walk and a balk put Phil Bunting '05 on second, and Barrett cut the lead to 4-3 when he drove home Bunting with a double. A Holy Cross pitching change didn't stall the Bison, as Moss banged out a triple to score Chris Grandizio '06 and a Day single sent home Moss for the go-ahead run. Day went three for four in the game, with two RBIs.

Futrick came in to finish off Holy Cross in the bottom of the seventh with a one-hit, scoreless inning to earn the save.

The win went to Kevin Miller '04, who is now 3-0 for the season. Miller pitched six innings, allowing four earned runs on six hits while striking out seven. He increased his team-leading season strike-out total to 19.

In the second game of the day, the pitchers dominated the first three innings, holding the offenses scoreless. Bucknell starter Grant held the Crusaders hitless through three frames and scoreless through five innings.

The Bison ended the scoring drought in the fourth, putting two runs on the board during the inning. After Day singled, Hirschberg delivered a two-run home run to right field. After the weekend, Hirschberg leads the team in home runs (4) and RBIs (15), as well as slugging percentage (.660).

The Bison saw their two-run lead reduced to one in the sixth inning when Holy Cross scraped up a run on two hits. The Orange and Blue quickly widened the lead to two runs again in the seventh inning, when a walk and a bunting sacrifice moved Kyle Walter '06 to second and Stoll's triple sent Walter to the plate for a 3-1 lead.

Stoll was a handful for the Crusaders all day, ending the contest with four hits in four at-bats.

Holy Cross attempted to rally in the bottom of the inning, scoring a run on three consecutive hits. With runners on first and second and no outs, Matt Daley '04 got out of the jam with a 4-6-3 double play and a foul out.

Grant pitched a solid six innings to earn his third win of the year. He allowed five hits, struck out five batters and gave up only two earned runs. Daley earned his first save of the year with his two-hit effort to close off the victory for the Bison.

Grant was pleased with the weekend's results.

"It's important to start strong in league play. A combination of solid pitching and timely hitting helped us win three out of four games," Grant said.

The defense was also a crucial part of the wins on Saturday, finishing the day without committing any errors.

Depew emphasized the importance of the Bison defense.

"On Saturday we got good pitching and played errorless defense," Depew said. "When we do that, we will have a chance to win."

Overall, Depew was pleased with the series.

"We are pleased to be able to go on the road and win three of four games in a series," Depew said. "Every game was very competitive and we were fortunate to make some good plays in the seventh inning of each game. I'm pleased with the way we competed and found ways to win."

Ciccione stressed the importance of the team's spirited approach to Holy Cross's challenges.

"The competitiveness we displayed this weekend must be shown in every Patriot League series if we hope to compete," Ciccione said. "While we certainly do not have the most talent in the Patriot League, I doubt that any team in the league has more heart than us."

The team will have another chance to display their grit when they head to Annapolis, Md., this weekend to face Navy, the team selected in the preseason poll to finish first in the Patriot League. Ciccione knows that the Bison must be at their best to defeat Navy.

"In order for us to win at Navy, it will take everyone's focus and intensity for four games since they are the most talented and experienced team in the conference," Ciccione said. "Much more will be known about our team after the four games this weekend in Annapolis."

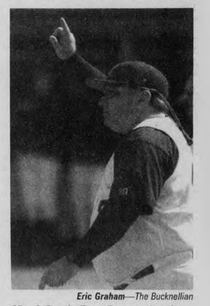
Sam Moss '04 adjusts his elbow padding. Moss hit a triple during the Bison's seventh-inning rally.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Head Coach Gene Depew signals a baserunner during a home game. Depew's Bison are 11-5 overall.

Depew is looking forward to the challenge.

"We are now focused on what will be a very crucial series with Navy this coming weekend at Annapolis," Depew said. "We are looking forward to measuring ourselves against the preseason pick to win the league."

The away games start at noon tomorrow and Sunday.

Burying ancient artifacts beneath bombs

Iraq: the cradle of Western civilization

On the land we now call Iraq, much of Western civilization first flowered. The Greeks called it Mesopotamia, "the land between the rivers," but it has been home to many great civilizations since the area's fertile alluvial soil and abundant water first attracted early farmers. Many Old Testament stories — Noah and the flood, the Tower of Babel, even the Garden of Eden — have been traced by researchers to this region. Over the centuries, great civilizations — Sumer, Babylon, Persia — rose and fell as various societies took hold or invaders occupied the land. Here is a look at some of the significant early empires to have controlled the lands near the Tigris and Euphrates rivers:

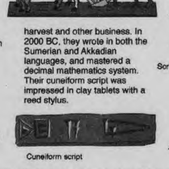
Sumer: the first great civilization

Advances in farming skills and husbandry allowed early agricultural settlements to produce surplus food. As a result, some people in the village could branch off into skilled crafts or mining. Nonfarmers could trade goods for food, and villages could trade with other villages. The settlements grew into cities and more people specialized in nonfarm tasks, including merchants, scribes, warriors and religious leaders. Eventually, a loosely connected network of city-states grew into a civilization known as Sumer.

Many 'firsts'

Many of history's greatest developments took place in early Mesopotamia:

- Agriculture: Successfully exploiting Mesopotamia's rich soil required that Sumerian farmers cooperate to build irrigation canals and dikes.
- Use of copper
- Villages, cities and urban civilization
- Herding and animal husbandry
- Making of bronze
- Code of Laws
- Mathematics
- Calendars and maps
- Wheel — for carts and making pottery
- Written language is invented, with scribes keeping track of the harvest and other business. In 2000 BC, they wrote in both the Sumerian and Akkadian languages, and mastered a decimal mathematics system. Their cuneiform script was impressed in clay tablets with a reed stylus.



Cuneiform script

Basis for the 'Tower of Babel'? Sumerians built ziggurats, or temples, such as this one in the city of Ur. A different ziggurat, in Babylon, was believed to have been 300 feet high and may have been the basis for the Tower of Babel in the Book of Genesis.

Some of the events in Iraq of archeological significance

The land of Mesopotamia was home to several important early societies.

c. 5000 BC immigrants settle in Sumer; first towns; copper used.

c. 3500 BC First civilization; first city-states; Ur founded; cuneiform script developed.

2350 BC Sargon, the king of Kish, unites cities to form an empire known as Akkadia.

1792-1750 BC The era of Old Babylon is marked by the reign of Hammurabi and his Code of Laws ("an eye for an eye . . .").

c. 1700 BC Abraham is born and raised in Ur, in what is now southern Iraq. He is venerated by Christians, Muslims and Jews as patriarch of their faiths.

1000 BC Assyrians invaders subjugate Mesopotamian people.

Neo-Babylonian Empire

Many view this period as the apogee of 5,000 years of Mesopotamian civilization.

612 BC Chaldeans defeat the Assyrians and Neo-Babylonian age begins.

605-562 BC Nebuchadnezzar II rebuilds and rules Babylon. Travelers would enter through the magnificent Ishtar Gate. Babylon is home to the Hanging Gardens, which Herodotus named one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world. Nebuchadnezzar captures Jerusalem and the Jews are exiled in Babylonia in 586 BC.

Ishtar Gate

c. 740 BC King Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria establishes a permanent conscripted army of thousands of men from conquered lands.

669 BC Assyria destroys Babylon.

Persian Empire

The city of Babylon was one of five capitals of the Persian Empire. It later served as capital of Alexander the Great's far-flung conquests. In the era of the "Arabian Nights," the Arab Empire created a new capital, Baghdad.

539 BC Persians from what is now Iran conquer Babylonia and much of the Middle East.

331 BC Alexander the Great captures Mesopotamia from the Persians. By the time Alexander dies of fever in Babylon eight years later at the age of 32, he has assembled a vast empire stretching from Egypt to the Indus River, spreading Greek culture and language to the entire known world. His generals fight over Alexander's empire after his death, but the Hellenistic influence remains for centuries.

AD 637 Arab Muslim conquerors take control.

AD 762 Arab Abbasid dynasty establishes a new capital of Baghdad.

AD 800 Baghdad is a world center of culture and trade with a population of more than 1 million. people.

While much of the world turns its attention toward the economic, social and political implications of war in Iraq, a selection of the global academic community has been monitoring a different heartbeat of the war—that of the archaeological and historical implications of what is happening in Iraq, and Bucknell is no exception. Two separate departments—classics and geography—have shown a PBS video entitled "Iraq: The Cradle of Civilization," written and narrated by historian Michael Wood, during the past two weeks to enlighten students on the historical context of the war.

The area we know as modern Iraq was once Mesopotamia, the site of the Fertile Crescent, where ancients living between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers first used agriculture to form settled communities. Uruk, a Sumerian settlement dating back to 4000 B.C., stood as the world's first city. This settlement was the birthplace of much of what defines civilization, including writing, pottery, maps, mathematics and even the first university. Still a vibrant region, Iraq contains the world's oldest continuously inhabited cities.

According to the Bible, the Garden of Eden and Tower of Babel once stood in Mesopotamia. Abraham, well-known for being one of the fathers of Judaism, was a citizen of Ur. The biblical story of the Great Flood survived by Noah is based on the devastating floods that took place here, and even the book of "Genesis" says this is where life began.

Of course, all this makes Iraq a haven for archaeologists. The towering ziggurat at Uruk, still standing, was once a temple to the goddess Innana. Hammurabi developed his legal code in Babylon in 1750 B.C., and prehistoric villages lie all over the desert, along with thousands of inscribed tablets, stone statues, tiles, pottery and more.

Much more recently, Iraq's government created a Department of Antiquities, under which scholars from all over the world could come to excavate and study the history of these sites. Artifacts were recorded and carefully stored in museums in Baghdad and other major cities and excavation was closely regulated. That is, until the Gulf War.

When Iraqi President Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in 1990, archaeologists in Iraq hurried to secure historical objects within walls packed with sandbags. While open sites were damaged in the war (including the great ziggurat, which now bears over 400 bullet holes), the museums survived the war surprisingly well. It was not until the fighting ceased and rioting citizens plundered them that many objects were destroyed and others sold on the black market. The United Nation's economic embargo on Iraq meant that far less funding was available to support the Department of Antiquities, and looting and smuggling flourished in the absence of tight control.

Ironically, archaeology was just beginning to regain a hold on Iraq in the summer of 2001 when the conflict was drawn back into the Middle East by the Sept. 11 attacks. Now, as war is being waged in Iraq yet again, archaeologists fear a repeat performance of the destruction of artifacts and historical sites that that happened in 1991. Bombing, drilling and angry rioting have the potential to devastate any hopes of learning all that the land's history has to offer, and scholars are holding their breath.

As archaeologists wait to use Iraq's history for research, Hussein is using it for his own purposes. Historically speaking, Hussein is only the most recent in a long line of oppressive dictators to hold control over this region, many of whom date back to the most ancient times. What is striking about Iraq's current situation is that Hussein has been using the history of these dictators to draw authority to his own rule. By depicting himself in various artwork in a manner similar to that of Assyrian kings on ancient stone relief, he has set himself up as the rightful heir to a long line of rulers. Interestingly enough, the tyrants he has chosen to impersonate were among the most cruel and oppressive Iraq has seen. For example, Hussein has identified with Nebuchadnezzar, a tyrant who, at the height of the Babylonian empire, conquered Israel and brought the Jews back to Babylon in exile.

> "History is cyclical, not linear....Ancient Iraq brought us all the good things about civilization, but also cruelly, oppression and war. And that's what civilization is—the good and the bad coming together."

Hussein has also rebuilt the ruined walls of ancient Babylon, writing his achievements on the bricks just as the city's first kings did. Doing so has generated controversy both over his propaganda ploy and over the damage the reconstruction has caused to the archaeological site.

"History is cyclical, not linear," Associate Professor of Classics Janet Jones said about watching the PBS video with her students. "Iraq has seen so many harsh rulers that Saddam's rule is another in a long line of tyrannies. Ancient Iraq brought us all the good things about civilization, but also cruelty, oppression and war. And that's what civilization is—the good and the bad coming together."

Unfortunately, damage done to Iraq's archaeological treasures hurts more than one culture: It is the destruction of evidence from the very origins of Western Civilization. The world's cultures grew out of ideas and inventions that originated in Mesopotamia, and so many heritages are tied into the identity of that one place. There is more than oil buried under the sand of Iraq; let's just hope it's still there when the war ends.

Flashback: Vietnam protesters speak out

By Jack Schmidt '72
Editor-in-Chief '71

> This is not the first time there has been a controversial war in the University's history. The Vietnam War produced many articles in The Bucknellian, as students began speaking out against the events unfolding in Southeast Asia. This is an article from The Bucknellian archives dated Feb. 12, 1971.

In a demonstration against "the mounting inhumanity of our government" and expressing "outrage at the American-directed invasion of Laos," one-hundred twenty persons, mostly from the University, joined in a march through the streets of Lewisburg on Wednesday afternoon.

The day was marked by the actions of seven students who returned their draft cards to the local draft board office on Fifth Street. The students were Barry Brown, Bill Gardiner, Ed McGill, Bob Miller, Rus Pais, Mark Powers, and Allen Wheatcroft.

The march began at the library headquarters where the protesters sang a few verses of the old civil rights song, "We Shall Overcome."

The group then moved to the draft board office where other songs were sung. Pais attempted to turn in his draft card at this time, and spoke of his cards as "symbols I no longer want to be a part of." The board was closed for lunch, and, after some discussion, the group decided to march up Market Street to the Federal Court House.

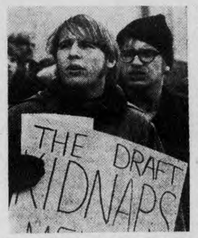
Local police, whose presence was evident throughout the march requested that the marchers stay on at noon, and the group proceeded down Seventh Street to the ROTC the sidewalk, and the group complied with the request. There were no incidents.

The group "occupied" the steps of the court house, collectively read a statement of protest, sang songs, broke bread together, and distributed literature to passers-by.

Lewisburg residents seemed to take only partial notice of the marchers, but accepted the position papers they were presented with. Perhaps the most attention paid the group by the local news reporters and photographers. WUDO covered the march with frequent "bulletins" interrupting their regular programs.

The marchers then returned to the draft office, and Pais and others presented their cards. Pais expressed his sentiments after disposing of his card: "It's done. I feel relieved."

The marchers took part in the hour and a half demonstration with mixed feelings as to their own motives for acting. A perhaps not untypical comment was the one of a marcher who said, "I'm not sure its accomplishing what it's supposed to." The gentlemen next to him returned, "What is it supposed to do."



The sentiments of many were expressed on this placard displayed by Tom Jones, '74.

The march had been agreed on at a mass meeting held Tuesday night in Vaughan Literature Auditorium. Prof. Jerome Rinyus delivered an opening speech outlining the intelligence operations of the U.S. in Vietnam. In conclusion, he asked that the least anyone could do in response to the Laos invasion was to "convince one other person that killing other men is wrong."

Rick Beardsley then attempted to guide the open discussion among the approximately three hundred attending the meeting. It was hoped that the group would develop an appropriate course of action for the following day.

For the next hour, various points were raised ranging from suggestions to shovel sidewalks to a challenge for the "truly committed" to burn the draft files at the local board office.

Frustration abounded, and Beardsley was led at one point to plead, "Let's just take a vote on something." Karl Patten suggested the march which was carried out the next day.

The following is the protest statement of the marchers:

We, individual members of the Bucknell community, protest the mounting inhumanity of our government. We are here today to express our outrage at the American-directed invasion of Laos, which we regard as yet another immoral and illegal action of our government in Southeast Asia. But we realize that Laos is essentially a foreign version of our domestic disregard for human life and liberty, a disregard which has exploded in violence and repression across the land. Standing here we affirm that life and liberty and ask that all men join us.

Beef with Uncle Sam

Uncle Sam: During the war of 1812, a patriot, Samuel Wilson, supplied U.S. troops with beef in barrels. The barrels were labeled "U.S.," and when a worker was asked what it stood for, he responded, "Uncle Sam," referring to his employer. The troops began to associate Uncle Sam with the federal government, and the idea was picked up by a cartoonist who created the image that is so well known today.

The American Flag: Everyone knows that the American flag has 13 red and white stripes to represent the original 13 colonies and 50 stars to represent all of the states in the Union today. But did you ever wonder why red, white and blue? The white signifies purity and innocence, the red shows valor and bravery and the blue represents vigilance, perseverance and justice.

The Bald Eagle: Our national symbol is a well-known symbol of the strength, courage and freedom of our nation. The decision to use the Bald Eagle was actually a result of a six-year debate in Congress.

The National Seal: The seal was created Benjamin Franklin, John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, and finalized in 1782. The eagle holds 13 olive leaves and 13 arrows to "denote the power of peace and war." Above the eagle there are 13 stars within a circular cloud, showing that America is a new state among many other nations. Along the top reads "e pluribus unum." The reverse side of the seal, sometimes called the spiritual side, has a 13-step pyramid topped by an eye. At the bottom of the pyramid the year 1776 is written in Roman numerals, under which a scroll reads, "New order of the ages." Across the top, the eye and words mean, "He favors our undertakings."

The Liberty Bell: The current bell is actually not the original bell. When the bell arrived from London, it cracked and so local blacksmiths melted it down and recast it. We currently have the third casting of the bell. But the bell had a rough history, including being hidden in the basement of the Zion's Reformed Church in Allentown, Pa., during the Revolutionary War so as to protect it from the British. It is now rung lightly every Fourth of July.

The Statue of Liberty: A gift from the people of France, its formal name is "Liberty Enlightening the World." At her feet lie "the chains of tyranny" and atop her head are seven rays to symbolize the seven seas and continents.

ROTC teaches leadership and discipline skills

University cadets participate in an outdoor leadership activity. Cadets attend leader labs and field training exercises throughout each semester to apply classroom information in practical ways.

While most University students are asleep in bed at 6 a.m. on Monday morning, cadets of the University's ROTC program are wide awake and beginning their physical training (PT).

Students enter the ROTC program two ways—either through the scholarship process or by expressing interest in the first or second year of college. Those who decide to enter the scholarship process during their senior year of high school sign a binding contract to complete the ROTC program, get a four-year degree and go on to a commission.

Students who are interested in serving their country but have not gone through the scholarship process can participate for the first two years of college, but must decide at the beginning of their junior year whether to sign a contract and continue with the ROTC program.

Matt Gabler '06 chose ROTC because of his interest in both the military and college.

"I've always been interested in the military. My brother enlisted right after high school, and I saw the ROTC program—it allowed me to do the military, which I thought was a great and noble venture, and at the same time go to college. It was the best of both worlds," Gabler said.

Emily Rentschler '03 selected ROTC because of its potential benefits.

"I saw no negatives to the program when I started looking into it during my freshman year," Rentschler said. "It would keep me in shape, help me to become a more effective leader and I would have a job upon graduation, which would put me in a good position for a business career later in life if I choose to leave the Army."

The requirements for ROTC vary based on class year. First-year cadets have one hour of ROTC class, sophomores have two and juniors and seniors have three. All of the cadets have mandatory PT on Monday, Wednesday and Friday.

Lt. Col. Nate Smyth, director of ROTC, emphasized that the ROTC program is based on leadership and exemplifies this through its events.

"ROTC is the best leadership program offered in America. It teaches cadets time management, leadership, decision making and discipline," Smyth said. "ROTC is cadet-run. The cadre [leadership] provides oversight, resources and steer them in the right direction, but senior cadets plan, organize and execute events."

Some of these events include leader labs that occur one Saturday per month. These sessions provide time for cadets to take what they've learned in their military science courses and put it into operation.

"Leader labs are an opportunity to take classroom instruction and apply it outside. For example, the first-year and sophomore classes take an introductory course on land navigation, would learn how to read a map, determine distances and terrain features," Smyth said. "During the leader labs, we take it outside. You can't master land navigation unless you go outside and apply the information taught in class."

Leader labs are also used for small unit tactical training, such as firing M-16s, adventure training, including rock walls and zip lines, and leadership reaction courses. The cadets also hone in their drill and ceremony during leader labs.

Another way to build on leadership and training are field training exercises (FTX), which occur once a semester. Cadets leave campus on a Friday afternoon and return Sunday afternoon.

There are also extracurricular activities for the cadets. They can participate in the color guard, which presents the flags at University football games. Another organization within ROTC is the Ranger Challenge Team. These cadets compete against 21 other colleges in the brigade. The University team was seventh out of 22 this year, and received third place the year prior. Cadets also participate in fundraising and community service projects.

The ROTC program and its activities provide opportunities for cadets to experience new things, according to Paulo Castelo '06.

"I shot a M-16 gun—I had never shot a gun before in my life—canoed, rappelled over a wall. ROTC has taught me and continues to teach me so much," Castelo said.

Rentschler agree that she has learned a great deal from the ROTC program over her four years in the program.

"I have learned how to be an effective leader, how to work with many different types of people from varying backgrounds, as well as Army values, standards and tactics," Rentschler said. "I have learned a lot about myself from the experiences I have had and they have helped me to become a more well-rounded person."

> —Lt. Col. Nate Smyth, director of ROTC

Between the course work and the leader labs, students learn skills that can be used, not only for the military, but also in their day-to-day lives, Smyth said.

"A lot of the skills we teach here are applicable whether the student or cadet completes the ROTC program. The things we teach here are applicable at school and later on in life," Smyth said.

Smyth said that the cadets have many opportunities to use their leadership skills through participation in a variety of activities outside of ROTC.

"A lot of the cadets are S.A.L.S. (Scholar Athlete Leaders). They're scholars because they do well academically. They're athletes because they're both mentally and physically strong. They're leaders because they've accepted the challenge to head organizations here on campus and in the community—they're presidents of fraternities and sororities, on athletic teams like crew and rugby and many other organizations on campus," Smyth said.

Some have expressed concern over how the current war with Iraq will affect the ROTC cadets. Smyth said that the ROTC students will not be sent to Iraq.

"They will remain here on campus to finish up their four-year degrees. The Army realizes the importance of an education and wouldn't want to interrupt it, because as an officer, it's a big responsibility to lead others, and they wouldn't want to interrupt that learning process," Smyth said.

After the completion of a four-year degree, cadets choose from three different placements—active duty, the National Guard and Reserves. Most University students tend to choose active duty, according to Smyth.

"Most Bucknell University cadets choose active duty. They want to serve their country full-time, and they like the challenge of leading others," Smyth said.

Gabler feels ROTC helps him focus and prepare for the future.

"ROTC helps me work towards a goal that I always wanted—to be an officer in the military. I think it's also important the way it builds character. You learn skills that aren't just Army-oriented; you learn team building and leadership skills—and that's applicable anywhere," Gabler said.

A week in the life of an ROTC cadet

Emily Rentschler
Contributing Writer

On Monday morning, I wake up at 5:30 a.m. to go to physical training (PT) at 6 a.m., which lasts for an hour. I then come home and shower, catch up on the news, do some homework and go to class at 9 a.m. I then usually head over to the Spratt House (ROTC building) to talk to Lt. Col. Nate Smyth and Cap. Brian Elliott about different events that are going on, which typically lasts for 60-90 minutes.

Then I go do work for my regular classes and attend class at 2 p.m. At 3, I come home and start preparing for ROTC class that night, usually reading from our textbook and creating an agenda for a staff meeting that I run.

Next I iron my uniform, shine my boots and grab a bite to eat. We leave at 6 p.m. to go to Bloomsburg University for class. The lecture part of class is usually an hour to an hour and a half, and then I run my staff meeting to work on all of the training events we are currently planning for the cadets. We usually head home around 10 and get back on campus around 10:45 p.m.

On Tuesday, I don't have any mandatory ROTC activities, but I usually spend an hour or so sending out e-mails and working on issues we discussed during the meeting. I also swim or work out on my own since we don't have PT. Then, I'll head over to Spratt House to talk to any cadet I need to regarding training events, uniforms, color guard—really anything that cadets are involved in.

Wednesday is PT again in the morning, and then normal classes. I might spend an hour or two doing ROTC stuff, depending on how much there is. Thursday is similar to Tuesday, but if we have a training event planned for that Saturday, I'll spend more time at Spratt House. If not, I may or may not stop by.

On Friday, I have PT again. Other than that, my ROTC time is dependent on whether or not we have an event the next day. If we have a training event on Saturday, I'll usually be preparing for it Friday night—going over final details and preparing myself for the tasks I am responsible for. On a normal Saturday, I usually have off from ROTC. If we do have an event, it is usually all day—from about 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. or later, depending on the event. Sunday is also a day that I do minimal work for ROTC—maybe send some e-mails regarding class for the next day.

That is my basic ROTC week. I usually try to go to bed by 10:30-11 p.m. when I have PT the next morning. Different times of the year are busier than others. In the fall, we are responsible for the color guards at the football games, which is a Saturday commitment. In the spring, we have a lot more events in a short period of time, so the senior staff does a lot more work and our staff meetings are longer.

As a senior, I have more work that I did as a first-year student or sophomore. Junior year, I spent more time doing individual prep work rather than working with the other cadets or the cadre on a daily basis.

How to take care of the red, white and blue

This collection of questions has been answered by using the U.S. Flag Code. While this is an official document, there are no actual penalties for any offenses against this code. Instead it is meant to be a basic code of conduct, but not a mandatory one.

How should I hang my flag?

Not: Draped over the hood, top, sides or back of a vehicle, railroad train or boat. When the flag is displayed on a motorcar, the staff shall be fixed firmly to the chassis or clamped to the right fender.

On a pole: It should be the highest flag and should be in front of any other flags.

On a wall: The union should be uppermost and to the observer's left. When displayed in a window, the flag should be displayed in the same way, with the union or blue field to the left of the observer in the street.

When should the flag be displayed?

It is the universal custom to display the flag only from sunrise to sunset on buildings and on stationary flagstaffs in the open. When a patriotic effect is desired, the flag may be displayed 24 hours a day if properly illuminated during the hours of darkness.

What is the procedure of putting a flag at half staff?

The flag, when flown at half staff, should be first hoisted to the peak for an instant and then lowered to the half staff position. The flag should be again raised to the peak before it is lowered for the day.

Are there particular days the flag should be up?

Particular days of display New Year's Day, January 1; Inauguration Day, January 20; Lincoln's Birthday, February 12; Washington's Birthday, third Monday in February, Easter Sunday; Mother's Day, second Sunday in May; Armed Forces Day, third Saturday in May; Memorial Day (half-staff until noon), the last Monday in May; Flag Day, June 14; Independence Day, July 4; Labor Day, first Monday in September; Constitution Day, Sept. 17; Columbus Day, second Monday in October; Navy Day, Oct. 27; Veterans Day, Nov. 11; Thanksgiving Day, fourth Thursday in November; Christmas Day, Dec. 25; and such other days as may be proclaimed by the president of the United States; the birthdays of states (date of admission); and on state holidays.

When should the flag be at half staff?

On Memorial Day the flag should be displayed at half staff until noon only, then raised to the top of the staff. By order of the president, the flag shall be flown at half staff upon the death of principal figures of the U.S. government. In the event of the death of other officials or foreign dignitaries, the flag is to be displayed at half staff according to presidential instructions or orders, or in accordance with recognized customs or practices not inconsistent with law.

How long should I keep the flag at half staff?

Death of president (or former): 30 days from the death of the president or a former president

Vice President: 10 days

Chief Justice (or retired) or the Speaker of the House: from the day of death until interment of an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

What does an upside down flag mean, and is it legal?

A flag displayed with the union down is prohibited except as a signal of dire distress in instances of extreme danger to life or property.

Is there a certain way to carry the flag?

The flag should never be carried flat or horizontally, but always aloft and free.

What do you do with a tattered flag?

The flag, when it is in such condition that it is no longer a fitting emblem for display, should be destroyed in a dignified way, preferably by burning.

What about flags on clothing?

The flag should never be used as wearing apparel, bedding or drapery. It should never be festooned, drawn back, nor up, in folds, but always allowed to fall free. Bunting of blue, white and red, always arranged with the blue above, the white in the middle and the red below, should be used for covering a speaker's desk, draping the front of the platform and for decoration in general.

How about all of the flags being used in advertisements?

The flag should never be used for advertising purposes. It should not be embroidered on such articles as cushions or handkerchiefs printed or otherwise impressed on paper napkins or boxes or anything that is designed for temporary use and discard. Advertising signs should not be fastened to a staff or halyard from which the flag is flown.

But what if the flag is being worn to show patriotism?

No part of the flag should ever be used as a costume or athletic uniform. A flag patch may be affixed to the uniform of military personnel, firemen, policemen and members of patriotic organizations.

Where should you wear a flag pin?

The flag represents a living country and is itself considered a living thing. The lapel flag pin being a replica should be worn on the left lapel near the heart.

What is the meaning of the flag folding ceremony?

The first fold of our flag is a symbol of life.

The second fold is a symbol of our belief in the eternal life.

The third fold is made in honor and remembrance of the veteran departing our ranks who gave a portion of life for the defense of our country to attain a peace throughout the world.

The fourth fold represents our weaker nature, for as American citizens trusting in God, it is to Him we turn in times of peace as well as in times of war for His divine guidance.

The fifth fold is a tribute to our country, for in the words of Stephen Decatur, "Our country, in dealing with other countries, may she always be right; but it is still our country, right or wrong."

The sixth fold is for where our hearts lie. It is with our heart that we pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America, and to the republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

The seventh fold is a tribute to our Armed Forces, for it is through the Armed Forces that we protect our country and our flag against all her enemies, whether they are found within or without the boundaries of our republic.

The eighth fold is a tribute to the person who entered in to the valley of the shadow of death, that we might see the light of day, and to honor mother, for whom it flies on Mother's Day.

The ninth fold is a tribute to womanhood; for it has been through their faith, love, loyalty and devotion that the character of the men and women who have made this country great have been molded.

The 10th fold is a tribute to father, for he, too, has given his sons and daughters for the defense of our country since they were first born.

The 11th fold, in the eyes of a Hebrew citizen, represents the lower portion of the seal of King David and King Solomon, and glorifies, in their eyes, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

The 12th fold, in the eyes of a Christian citizen, represents an emblem of eternity and glorifies, in their eyes, God the Father, the Son and Holy Ghost.

When the flag is completely folded, the stars are uppermost, reminding us of our national motto, "In God we trust."

How do you fold the flag?

Step One: To properly fold the flag, begin by holding it waist-high with another person so that its surface is parallel to the ground.

Step Two: Fold the lower half of the stripe section lengthwise over the field of stars, holding the bottom and top edges securely.

Step Three: Fold the flag again lengthwise with the blue field on the outside.

Step Four: Make a triangular fold by bringing the striped corner of the folded edge to meet the open (top) edge of the flag.

Step Five: Turn the outer (end) point inward, parallel to the open edge, to form a second triangle.

Step Six: The triangular folding is continued until the entire length of the flag is folded in this manner.

Step Seven: The triangular folding is continued until the entire length of the flag is folded in this manner

"Blanche White" novelist gives reading

By Beth Kengeter
Staff Writer

Raising issues of color and class within the black community in her writing, mystery novelist Barbara Neely read a piece from her latest novel, "Blanche Passes Go" at The Stadler Center for Poetry.

Mystery novelist Barbara Neely read a selection from her latest novel, "Blanche Passes Go," Sunday evening. Neely, author of the popular Blanche White mystery novels, read for a full audience despite the snowy weather.

"I thought it was very good," Tyler Mills '05 said. "I studied her works last semester and it was interesting to hear them read in person."

Before reading her selection, Neely gave a brief introduction to the title character, Blanche White. Blanche is a black lower-class household servant who happens to be a detective. Poor and single, Blanche White represents the "invisible people" in society, those who work service jobs and go unnoticed. Many individuals will do things in front of lower-class citizens that they would not otherwise do in public. Neely said she uses Blanche White as a way to look at society from "beneath her skirts."

The issues raised in these books go beyond the superficial murder mystery plot to look at the issues of color and class within the black community, the environment, race and violence against women. In describing her style, Neely compared herself to a magician flashing around her right hand while performing the trick with the left. The murder mystery is a way to pull people in who would not otherwise read a book about race and class.

"I thought her discussion on the myth that just because one has more money and education doesn't mean that they are better than anyone else was particularly interesting," Kristin Lunny '05 said. "It was just a really true statement that people often forget."

"Blanche on the Lam" was the first novel in the Blanche White series and won the Agatha, Macavity and Anthony awards, three of the four major awards for best first novel in the mystery genre. Since then Neely has written in "Blanche among the Talented Tenth," "Blanche Cleans Up" and "Blanche Passes Go." The Blanche White mysteries have been translated into French, German and Japanese.

In addition to writing, Neely has worked extensively in the public sector. She designed and directed the first community-based corrections facility for women in Pennsylvania, directed a branch of the YWCA and headed a consulting firm for nonprofit organizations. She has served in leadership roles with the Institute for Social Research and Women for Economic Justice, and has been a radio producer for Africa News Service. For her activism, she has received the Community Works Social Action Award for Leadership and Activism for Women's Rights and Economic Justice and the Fighting for Women's Voices Award from the Coalition for Basic Human Needs.

Pianist Snyder tickles keys, audience

By Julianna Pietak

CONCERT REVIEW

Pianist Barry Snyder gave an intense and virtuosic performance Friday evening in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts. Providing an alternative to House Party festivities, Snyder played pieces ranging from a classical Franz Joseph Haydn to a piece written for him in 1992.

According to the program notes, Snyder was the winner of three major prizes at the acclaimed Van Cliburn International Piano Competition in 1966. He now teaches at the equally prestigious Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N.Y.

Professor of Music Barry Hannigan invited Snyder to campus because of his musical eminence.

"I brought him here for Bucknell students to hear really world-class piano technique; he really is world-class," Hannigan said.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Winner of three major prizes at the Van Cliburn International Piano Competition in 1966, Pianist Barry Snyder poses for a picture before performing. Snyder played a range of classical music at the University last Friday.

The evening's performance left the listener amazed at the sheer intensity of the music and talent of the performer. The first piece performed was Haydn's Sonata in C Major, Hob. XVI/50. Containing three separate movements—an allegro, adagio and allegro molto—and each movement was distinctive in its tempo. Three of the movements had a bright and classical air with a large dynamic range.

The next two pieces on the program for the evening were Maurice Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit" and "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," by Johannes Brahms, both written during the Romantic period. The first, "Gaspard de la Nuit," sounded hushed and almost dreamlike, despite its virtuosic use of the whole keyboard. As the piece grew, so did the sound, ending dramatically and powerfully in the last movement, "Scarbo." The skillful handling of the notes continued in Brahms' piece, taken from a theme originally written for a solo string player.

After a brief intermission, the pianist continued the concert with "Four Concert Improvisations on the Name Barry Snyder," which Carter Pann wrote specifically for Snyder. Each movement of this piece is fairly simple with great variation in texture and tempo. In a modern twist, Snyder plucked the inside of the piano during the second movement, "Feux D'artifice."

Following this modern composition was the songlike "Waltz from Coppelia" by Delibes-Dohnanyi. Alexander Scriabin's Sonata No. 5, Opus 53 brought the evening's performance to a very stirring and forceful end.

Throughout the night, Snyder brought both intense concentration and ease to all the pieces he performed. The attentiveness and poise continued even when his music fell off the piano.

"I was really scared when his music fell down," Margaret Fairfield '05 said. "It's like when iceskaters fall down during their performance. But I liked his stage presence. When you like the performer, it is easier to like the music."

Perhaps the culmination of his world-class technique and stage presence was best summed up by music student Sarah Houck '06.

"I just thought he was amazing," Houck said.

Footloose and fancy free, dance showcase highlights choreographers

By Melinda Kummer
Arts & Entertainment Editor

From primal to folk to chair dancing—the choreographer's showcase displayed the breadth of dance styles. Between pointe shoes and the Vengaboys, student and faculty choreographers were given the opportunity to shine in the Tustin Black Box Theatre March 27-28.

A display of creative and performing talent, the showcase celebrated both modern and classical styles of dancing. At times conservative and at times experimental, the show combined elegance and zest.

Ballet set to contemporary music made some of the pieces more accessible to the audience. Associate Professor of Theatre Er-Dong Hu created an interpretive ballet choreographed to "Your Song," as sung by Ewan McGregor and Alessandro Safino from the "Moulin Rouge" soundtrack. First-year students Melissa Agrimanakis, Vita Lamberson and Diane Silverman's streaming costumes moved with the mood of the music. Sentimental and swaying, the ballet personified the music.

"Talking Drums," a piece choreographed by India Branch '03, reached back to tribal traditions.

Costumes incorporated a primitive theme with the raw and earthy dance, and dancers ranged from trained to novice.

"I've danced my whole life and this event is so low-key and so fun," Emily Rietsz '05 said. She performed in the first dance of the night, entitled "Blues in the Night," set to the music of Quincy Jones. The red and black costumes were striking in the dance choreographed by Melissa Loftus '03.

Most students attended the showcase in support of friends.

"I came to see my friend—whose choreography was great," Ashi Day '04 said. "I loved the tap number and wish they would offer it as a class."

Melissa Loftus—The Bucknellian

The tap number she referred to, choreographed by Stephanie Hager '05 and Kim Whittam of the theatre and dance department, imitated a modern party scene set to "We Like to Party" by the Vengaboys. Members of the University community not involved in dance classes were invited to participate in the piece.

Kopanista, a Bulgarian dance, colored by traditional costumes, delighted the audience as eight students flounced across the stage recreating a folk tradition. Choreographed by Associate Professor of Theatre and Dance Paula Davis-Larson, the dance offered exposure to an unfamiliar style. Audience participation reached its height as event-goers clapped along with the lively music.

In addition to the choreographer's showcase, the theatre and dance department plans to sponsor both "The Good Woman of Setzuan" on April 11-14 and the Bucknell Dance Company Spring Performance on April 25-26 to finish off its season.

Harmonizing with George Washington University Singers

Concert Chorale to perform on campus and in Washington, D.C., this Sunday

By Leah Cunningham
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Having performed across the United States—including Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, New York City and Buffalo—Bucknell's Concert Chorale will be heading to Washington, D.C., this Sunday to perform with George Washington University Singers. Before singing at George Washington University, the Concert Chorale will converge with the group tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center, singing for the spring theme, "Eventual peace and understanding among nations of the earth."

The spring exchange concert is presented by the University's Concert Chorale—conducted by Professor of Music William Payn and accompanist David Cover—and the George Washington University Singers—conducted by Bucknell alumnus and Assistant Professor of Music at George Washington University Matthew Mehaffey '97 and accompanist Alice Mikolajewski.

"I think this concert will be a great experience for the students of both universities. The fact that the choirs are similar in their missions and constituency should mean that coming together to perform on the same concert will be both fun and easy."
—Matthew Mehaffey, assistant professor of Music at GWU

"Dr. Mehaffey was a music education major with an emphasis in choral conducting. He studied beginning and advanced conducting with me and sang in the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Concert Chorale," Payn said. "He was tour manager for a concert tour that the Rooke Chapel Choir took to Puerto Rico. We have been planning this event for over a year. I wanted to bring Matt back to his undergraduate alma mater, and it seemed feasible to do it by having an exchange concert with our two larger ensembles. We will share the podium throughout the concert."

Free and open to the public, the program will feature Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" as well as music by Heinrich Schutz, John Tavener, Felix Mendelssohn and Healey Willan. According to Payn, the theme throughout the concert is peace, drawing on biblical sources for all of the texts.

Concert Chorale members are excited for the George Washington University guests.

"This concert is particularly unique in that we are sharing the stage with another very talented choir from George Washington University," Public Relations Chair Jennifer Butler '03 said. "It will be incredibly impressive to see and hear over 100 voices on the Weis Center stage. What a fantastic way to spend a spring Saturday evening!"

Both choirs will rehearse from 1-5 p.m. tomorrow afternoon on campus so the George Washington University Singers can become acquainted with the Weis Center's stage. This year the chorale is eager to share its spring concert with George Washington University Singers because their conductor, Mehaffey, formerly worked under Payn at Bucknell.

"I am very excited to bring the George Washington University Singers to Bucknell to perform with the Concert Chorale, a choir I sang in for four years. It is an honor to be able to perform with my first conducting teacher, William Payn. My musical career got its start at Bucknell, and it is very rewarding to be able to return with a group that I conduct to the beautiful Weis Center of the Performing Arts," Mehaffey said.

After performing this Saturday night at the Weis Center, the groups will then travel to George Washington University on Sunday to give the same performance.

"I'm really excited for the performances," Butler said. "This is my fourth year in Concert Chorale and it should be a really great combined performance."

Mehaffey feels this concert will be enjoyable for both the student performers and members of the audience.

"I think this concert will be a great experience for the students of both universities. The fact that the choirs are similar in their missions and constituency should mean that coming together to perform on the same concert will be both fun and easy, and should yield great results," Mehaffey said. "This should be a great performance for the audience as well, because it is rare that two choirs of this size and ability can get together to do music for double choir; it is a wonderful repertoire that often goes unperformed."

Beyond Aladdin—Arabic art takes the stage

By Melinda Kummer
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Knowledge of Arabic culture to some Americans extends no further than the magic carpet rides of Aladdin or the package covering on a box of Camel Lights. Turbans and veils are associated with snake charmer music and even Dana Carvey used this association for laughs in his movie "Master of Disguise." To those fascinated by the pop art of Western culture, Islamic art falls away as religiously restrained.

Though strict Islamic art is religiously motivated, Middle Eastern culture has shaped Western thought on ideas of what art encompasses. The Mesopotamian area, also known as the cradle of civilization, boasts some of the oldest forms of art. Using mediums such as tiling and silk, Middle Easterners have forged the way in such arts as mosaic and rug weaving.

Most of us walk on Persian rugs and never think twice about the artistry involved in the manufacturing of the lovely carpets.

"Plants, flowers and even geometric motifs have special meanings. The cypress tree symbolizes mourning, as well as immortality through death. The palm and the coconut are metaphors of blessing and fulfillment. The peony symbolizes wealth, while the lotus foretells a great lineage," according to islamicart.com.

Infoplease.com notes in its section on Islamic art how calligraphy originated in Egypt during the mid-10th through 13th centuries.

Beyond lettering, painting and weaving, belly dancing as a visual art form is an Arabic tradition.

Today, Middle Eastern art still retains unique artistic styles. "Strokes of Genius" (SOG) a group now exhibiting in England, showcases the pieces of contemporary Iraqi artists. "ShowCaseArts," a publication of Islamic art and literature, asked the founder of the SOG project, Maysaloun Faraj, "whether there were any clearly delineated trends in Iraqi art [and she] described the plight of individual artists as the deciding factor, very much a personal response, usually depicting the homeland." A sampling of the art and an exhibition schedule is available at www.strokes-of-genius.com.

Eman Khalid's work is showcased in the Strokes of Genius exhibition tour in England. The tour started in October of 2000, and will culminate a tremendous six years of work and effort.

Lila Abu-Lughod describes the women in Bedouin society, expressing emotion and political discourse though oral lyrical poetry in her book "Veiled Sentiments." The modern movie "Lawrence of Arabia" is based on Bedouin culture.

While contemporary artists delve into themes of tragedy and heritage, art historians share a special concern for the protection of ancient art sites in Iraq. In 1991, the world-famous National Museum of Antiquities in Baghdad withstood bombing. Other culturally important sites such as ancient shrines may find themselves in the line of fire due to the current conflict.

Though Western civilization largely ignores the contributions of Islamic art, the roots found in its ancient traditions cannot be denied.

By Jennifer Jenchura

Former University medical director J. Preston Hoyle passed away March 29 at age 73 after an extended illness.

Hoyle became a member of the University community as a physician in 1962. After nearly 19 years as an associate physician in the student medical service he became the medical director of the University Student Health Service beginning in 1981. He was instrumental in initiating several campus medical programs such as the AIDS Task Force.

"As a result of this committee, the Pennsylvania Department of Health comes to campus on a regular basis to administer HIV testing. He was also instrumental in creating the Student Health Service Advisory Committee which prompted changes at the Student Health Service, such as the availability for prescription medication to be purchased at the health center and providing courier service for patients' laboratory specimens to Evangelical Community Hospital for analysis," said Nancy Shuck, Health Service assistant director.

Developing the University's first alcohol and drug program, Hoyle strived for better public health education, including treatment of alcohol and drug addiction.

"He was a kind and compassionate man who cared deeply about his family, colleagues, students and patients. He had a pleasant personality and a great sense of humor," said Bob Thomas, coordinator of drug and alcohol programs at the University.

Emmy award-winning journalist to speak about dealing with the curves in life's path

By Rachel Laskow

When this year's Commencement speaker was announced on Tuesday, many students were quick to judge the decision and immediately offered negative comments. Once students got past the fact that they had never heard her name and realized that she was a two-time Emmy winner, many decided that Deborah Norville, the anchor of CBS' "Inside Edition," could provide an informative and influential speech.

"I was a bit taken aback when I first found out because most people were not expecting a television host, but I look forward to her insight and words of advice for the Class of 2003 as we start off journeys after Bucknell," Emily Resnick '03 said.

According to Class of 2003 President Laura Day, Norville will speak about how people can deal with emotions during a time of crisis.

"Deborah Norville has demonstrated her perseverance in both the public and private roles as a news anchor for 'Inside Edition,' author of 'Back on Track,' a mother of three and an Emmy winner. She provides inspiration to all who have faced obstacles in reaching their goals, specifically how to get 'back on your feet after a crushing defeat,'" Day said. "I am excited to hear Deborah Norville's compelling message and timely commentary in light of our complicated times."

Norville has hosted "Inside Edition" since 1995 and, according to insideedition.com, ratings for the nation's top-rated syndicated show climbed 15 percent in the first week she was a host.

Before hosting "Inside Edition," Norville anchored CBS' "America Tonight" and reported for "48 Hours," "Street Stories" and the "CBS Evening News." She was also a co-anchor of NBC's "Today Show."

Her book "Back On Track: How To Straighten Out Your Life When It Throws You A Curve" is based on her experiences at NBC's "Today Show." According to dnorville.com, her book offers a plan for renewal and redirection for women everywhere.

As a journalist, Norville has covered events such as the American Airlines jet crash in Cali, Colombia. She also interviewed Paula Jones for the first wide-ranging talk about the lawsuit against former U.S. President Bill Clinton. Mauriello '02 wins award for Bucknellian Greek series

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

Former Bucknellian Sports Editor Carmen Mauriello '02 is the first-place recipient of the collegiate public service/enterprise series category in the Pennsylvania Newspaper Association Foundation's annual Keystone Contest for the six-part series he wrote last spring investigating the University's Greek system.

"Carmen initiated the series of Greek articles. Each article was well-researched and provided a well-balanced insight into the Greek system. Carmen takes a lot of pride in his work and that certainly shows in his consistently excellent articles," former Bucknellian Editor-In-Chief Rachel Laskow '03 said.

Mauriello thought the story was newsworthy and interesting.

"There was a lot of questioning about the Greek system's future at Bucknell," Mauriello said. "People thought the administration was trying to close it down, and I thought the spring would be telling for the Greek system."

Originally, Mauriello was given one article assignment about fraternities not being able to fill their houses with enough members.

"In talking to the administration, it seemed a lot was going on, and a bunch of other article ideas came into my head. I wanted to hit as many angles as I could," Mauriello said.

There were four additional issues Mauriello focused on in his subsequent articles. The fraternity member size had changed and Mauriello reported that all fraternities used to be about equal in membership size, but over the years some lost members and some gained more. Mauriello also analyzed the Administration's idea of a bring-your-own-beer trial period.

"House Party was the third issue I focused on. There was a whole new set of rules and I basically analyzed those and judged the success of House Party," Mauriello said.

The last issue Mauriello wrote about was the rush changes for fraternities.

"This was an issue of trying to make it more fair so all fraternities got an equal shot," Mauriello said.

Mauriello said his hope was to inform people about what was going on during all the changes to the Greek system.

"I explored all that was going on and through the series helped more people understand what was going on instead of them listening to rumors. I just stuck to hard news and the changes happening in the system. I tried to get a lot of student feedback, for example, 'Did this make events better or worse?'" Mauriello said.

Mauriello has worked at The Daily Item for the past 10 months as a reporter, and he is pursuing journalism as a career.

"This is a really nice honor, and a nice thing to have on my résumé," Mauriello said.

Local paper exaggerates House Party incidents

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

Following the University tradition of House Party, from March 28-30 this year, a local newspaper published an article about House Party 2003, which was exaggerated, according to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro. While trying to tell a captivating story to its readers, the paper embellished certain happenings that went on several weeks ago.

"There were several things that were wrong with that article," Ferraro said.

The first item that the administration did not agree with is that the article spoke of lots of arrests in Lewisburg during the weekend.

"This House Party there were eight arrests and four of these arrests were non-Bucknell students, but rather guests of students. Also the article gave the impression that the arrests happened downtown, while in reality they happened on Fraternity Row either that Friday or Saturday night."

Another problem with the article is that it gave the illusion of mayhem in the streets and exaggerated effects, which caused the arrests.

"In actuality, the police simply stopped people who were drinking underage or speeding," Ferraro said.

The arrests did not result in sending students to jail. There are three levels of police involvement. The first is a felony, which results in jail time; the second is a misdemeanor, which is somewhat serious and has the possibility of spending time in jail; and the third level is a summary offense, which is simply a citation or a ticket. The students who met with the police during House Party

By Melinda Kummer
Arts & Entertainment Editor

From primal to folk to chair dancing—the choreographer's showcase displayed the breadth of dance styles. Between pointe shoes and the Vengaboys, student and faculty choreographers were given the opportunity to shine in the Tustin Black Box Theatre March 27-28.

A display of creative and performing talent, the showcase celebrated both modern and classical styles of dancing. At times conservative and at times experimental, the show combined elegance and zest.

Ballet set to contemporary music made some of the pieces more accessible to the audience. Associate Professor of Theatre Er-Dong Hu created an interpretive ballet choreographed to "Your Song," as sung by Ewan McGregor and Alessandro Safino from the "Moulin Rouge" soundtrack. First-year students Melissa Agrimanakis, Vita Lamberson and Diane Silverman's streaming costumes moved with the mood of the music. Sentimental and swaying, the ballet personified the music.

"Talking Drums," a piece choreographed by India Branch '03, reached back to tribal traditions.

Costumes incorporated a primitive theme with the raw and earthy dance, and dancers ranged from trained to novice.

"I've danced my whole life and this event is so low-key and so fun," Emily Rietsz '05 said. She performed in the first dance of the night, entitled "Blues in the Night," set to the music of Quincy Jones. The red and black costumes were striking in the dance choreographed by Melissa Loftus '03.

Most students attended the showcase in support of friends.

"I came to see my friend—whose choreography was great," Ashi Day '04 said. "I loved the tap number and wish they would offer it as a class."

The tap number she referred to, choreographed by Stephanie Hager '05 and Kim Whittam of the theatre and dance department, imitated a modern party scene set to "We Like to Party" by the Vengaboys. Members of the University community not involved in dance classes were invited to participate in the piece.

Kopanista, a Bulgarian dance, colored by traditional costumes, delighted the audience as eight students flounced across the stage recreating a folk tradition. Choreographed by Associate Professor of Theatre and Dance Paula Davis-Larson, the dance offered exposure to an unfamiliar style. Audience participation reached its height as event-goers clapped along with the lively music.

In addition to the choreographer's showcase, the theatre and dance department plans to sponsor both "The Good Woman of Setzuan" on April 11-14 and the Bucknell Dance Company Spring Performance on April 25-26 to finish off its season.

Harmonizing with George Washington University Singers

Concert Chorale to perform on campus and in Washington, D.C., this Sunday

By Leah Cunningham
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Having performed across the United States—including Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, New York City and Buffalo—Bucknell's Concert Chorale will be heading to Washington, D.C., this Sunday to perform with George Washington University Singers. Before singing at George Washington University, the Concert Chorale will converge with the group tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center, singing for the spring theme, "Eventual peace and understanding among nations of the earth."

The spring exchange concert is presented by the University's Concert Chorale—conducted by Professor of Music William Payn and accompanist David Cover—and the George Washington University Singers—conducted by Bucknell alumnus and Assistant Professor of Music at George Washington University Matthew Mehaffey '97 and accompanist Alice Mikolajewski.

"Dr. Mehaffey was a music education major with an emphasis in choral conducting. He studied beginning and advanced conducting with me and sang in the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Concert Chorale," Payn said. "He was tour manager for a concert tour that the Rooke Chapel Choir took to Puerto Rico. We have been planning this event for over a year. I wanted to bring Matt back to his undergraduate alma mater, and it seemed feasible to do it by having an exchange concert with our two larger ensembles. We will share the podium throughout the concert."

Free and open to the public, the program will feature Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" as well as music by Heinrich Schutz, John Tavener, Felix Mendelssohn and Healey Willan. According to Payn, the theme throughout the concert is peace, drawing on biblical sources for all of the texts.

Concert Chorale members are excited for the George Washington University guests.

"This concert is particularly unique in that we are sharing the stage with another very talented choir from George Washington University," Public Relations Chair Jennifer Butler '03 said. "It will be incredibly impressive to see and hear over 100 voices on the Weis Center stage. What a fantastic way to spend a spring Saturday evening!"

Both choirs will rehearse from 1-5 p.m. tomorrow afternoon on campus so the George Washington University Singers can become acquainted with the Weis Center's stage. This year the chorale is eager to share its spring concert with George Washington University Singers because their conductor, Mehaffey, formerly worked under Payn at Bucknell.

"I am very excited to bring the George Washington University Singers to Bucknell to perform with the Concert Chorale, a choir I sang in for four years. It is an honor to be able to perform with my first conducting teacher, William Payn. My musical career got its start at Bucknell, and it is very rewarding to be able to return with a group that I conduct to the beautiful Weis Center of the Performing Arts," Mehaffey said.

After performing this Saturday night at the Weis Center, the groups will then travel to George Washington University on Sunday to give the same performance.

"I'm really excited for the performances," Butler said. "This is my fourth year in Concert Chorale and it should be a really great combined performance."

Mehaffey feels this concert will be enjoyable for both the student performers and members of the audience.

"I think this concert will be a great experience for the students of both universities. The fact that the choirs are similar in their missions and constituency should mean that coming together to perform on the same concert will be both fun and easy, and should yield great results," Mehaffey said. "This should be a great performance for the audience as well, because it is rare that two choirs of this size and ability can get together to do music for double choir; it is a wonderful repertoire that often goes unperformed."

"I think this concert will be a great experience for the students of both universities. The fact that the choirs are similar in their missions and constituency should mean that coming together to perform on the same concert will be both fun and easy."

Thomas-Buchanan hired as new dean for diversity

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

The University hired Associate Dean of Students Dr. Linda Thomas-Buchanan, whose core responsibilities will be diversity issues when she starts June 1.

According to Vice President for Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede,

> "She has many fine personal qualities: She is ethically motivated, she is concerned about students and she cares about progress and reconciliation in racial matters."

Thomas-Buchanan will fill a position that has been left vacant for almost two years following former Dean of Students Edward Cowell's departure.

Thomas-Buchanan will be responsible for all issues related to diversity. According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, Thomas-Buchanan will also supervise the directors of the Women's Resource Center, the Office of Lesbian, Gay, Transgender and Bisexual Awareness, International Student Services and Multicultural Affairs.

Her duties will also include working with admissions on matters related to recruitment and pertinent summer programs.

"I think she will bring vision, a sense of fairness and a student-centered approach. She is very articulate, she is committed to intellectual inquiry… she is calm in her approach but passionate about justice and she will challenge our students to do their best, while lending active support," Ferraro said.

According to Thiede, Buchanan was one of 80 applicants that were interested in the position. The four most qualified candidates were invited to the University, yet the bid to offer Thomas-Buchanan the position was a unanimous decision by the committee.

"Her understanding of being both an administrator as well as a faculty member was very attractive," Thiede said.

The committee that selected Thomas-Buchanan was composed of two student representatives, one faculty member and four staff representatives.

"It was a good committee that worked hard," Thiede said.

Interim Director of Multicultural Affairs Danielle Smith also emphasized Thomas-Buchanan's excellence.

"Dr. Thomas-Buchanan has had an array of administrative as well as faculty experience revolving around multicultural issues in the higher education setting. Her interest in, as well as experience with, predominately white institutions definitely separated her from the other candidates," Smith said.

According to Ferraro, Buchanan's experience in directing a black cultural center and with regard to assessment of multicultural centers, gives her a background which can be very helpful here.

"She has many fine personal qualities: She is ethically motivated, she is concerned about students and she cares about progress and reconciliation in racial matters," Ferraro said.

Thomas-Buchanan received her M.A. and Ph.D. in both sociology and higher education administration from Washington State. Her focus centered on the educational experiences of black students at a predominately white institution.

"Buchanan will provide the leadership and momentum required to make positive change on our campus. Her background and experience in relation to diversity issues will definitely be beneficial to Bucknell," Smith said.

According to Thiede, to accomplish the goals of the current diversity plan as well as those of Vision 2010, it became very evident that this position [dean of diversity] needed to be filled.

> "Buchanan will provide the leadership and momentum required to make positive change on our campus. Her background and experience in relation to diversity issues will definitely be beneficial to Bucknell."
> —Danielle Smith, interim director of multicultural affairs*

The University community is excited to welcome Thomas-Buchanan and anticipates a promising future in achieving the University's and students' goals toward diversity.

Local paper criticizes students weekend were given citations, which usually involves a fine.

During House Party there was an increased number of Lewisburg area police officers patrolling the campus, and police from neighboring towns were on call.

"Many people assume that Bucknell University is extraterritoriality, like its own country, where outside police cannot come on, but the police do have that right," Ferraro said. "And when they come on campus and see someone underage drinking, they have the right to cite that individual."

Usually when there are alcohol violations, whether underage consumption or increased usage, the University handles these matters internally.

"With House Party, there are hundreds of guests from all over the country and in the past there have been guests who cause problems. However, when these guests are at Bucknell, it is still our job to look out for their safety. During House Party there are more police around anyway," Ferraro said.

This year there was stronger enforcement of the rules, according to Ferraro. He feels that it was a decent House Party. Many members of the administration don't get much sleep during the celebratory weekend due to the liability issues about which the deans have to worry.

"For what it was, I think House Party went will," Assistant Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Shauna Irwin said. "Major incidents were down this year. The school did all it could do to foster a safe environment for House Party."

The University is committed to making sure that House Party continues to run smoothly. In the upcoming weeks, Ferraro plans to talk to many people in the University community for different viewpoints about House Party, how it is run and what should be changed in the future.

> "Several years ago we had more people brought into the hospital but I believe people are more cognizant about helping. People also receive benefits of helping their friends under the influence through the partial amnesty plan."

"It's important to talk to different people because everyone has a different point of view of House Party. House Party is unusual and it is something that many schools have done away with and we have tended to try and keep it. We continue to work hard to make it fun and safe," Ferraro said.

Ferraro plans to gather opinions from people in all facets of University life, including deans, people in the athletics department and students.

"It is important to talk to the students because this is all for them," Ferraro said.

This year only one student was brought into the hospital and that was for precautionary reasons.

"Several years ago we had more people brought into the hospital, but I believe people are more cognizant about helping," Ferraro said. "People also receive benefits of helping their friends under the influence through the partial amnesty plan."

Partial amnesty is an idea that was invented under the alcohol violations point system. If someone drinks too much, he or she would normally receive four points if caught. If the intoxicated person receives help from a friend, he or she will only receive one point if caught. The partial amnesty rule is only granted once to an individual to prevent people from engaging in destructive behavior.

Ferraro has found that people make better judgments as a result of the partial amnesty plan, which are more likely to come into play during times of heavy drinking. House Party has already been scheduled for next year and the administration hopes to have a successful House Party without arrests or hospitalization.

Hoyle, 73, dies after long battle with illness

Since his arrival in Lewisburg, Hoyle was a leader in the community. He served as medical consultant to the Union County Prison, deputy coroner and school physician for Lewisburg elementary schools.

Throughout his life, Hoyle had a special fondness for the care of children and young adults. He volunteered his services as a physician for the county's Well Baby Clinic and Head Start Program. He was also a member of the board trustees of Evangelical Hospital, a delegate to the Pennsylvania Medical Society, a deacon and trustee to the First Presbyterian Church of Lewisburg and a board member of the Lewisburg Listening Post.

After working for the National Institutes for Health, Hoyle attended the University of Pittsburgh and received his degree as a medical doctor in 1957. After medical school he gave spent years of service in the U.S. Army as a captain in the medical corps. Hoyle moved his family to Lewisburg in 1962 to begin his private practice of obstetric and pediatric medicine as well as to serve the University's student medical service.

Hoyle leaves behind his wife of 51 years, June, and three children, including Bucknell alumnus Susan Hoyle-Fournier '88.

"Having dry wit and always displaying a smile, Dr. Hoyle was dedicated to his profession and to mankind. He was a pleasure to work for," Secretary to Health Service Diane Walter said.

Commencement speakers do not reflect University intellectual pursuits

The announcement that CBS' "Inside Edition" news anchor Deborah Norville will deliver the 2003 Commencement address on Tuesday generated a negative response from much of the campus community. Many students and faculty members contend that Norville does not reflect the academic and intellectual nature of the University or the Commencement ceremony.

Former University President William D. "Bro" Adams established a Commencement speaker selection committee during his tenure at the University. The committee decided that future Commencement speakers should exhibit the characteristics of the University's highest honor, the Bucknell Award of Merit. The Award of Merit is presented to an individual who has distinguished him or herself internationally in the arts, sciences, letters or public service.

This resolution began in 1998 with the Commencement address delivered by Julian Bond, chairman of the NAACP, and continued through Adams' term as president with Aung San Suu Kyi, a leader of the democratic opposition in Burma in 1999 and Irish poet Eavan Boland in 2000.

Since the inauguration of University President Steffen Rogers in the fall of 2000, Adams' precedent of selecting a speaker deserving of the Award of Merit appears to have been lost.

Recent "disappointing" Commencement speakers include senior analyst for CNN's "Inside Politics" Jeff Greenfield in 2001 and entrepreneur and philanthropist Kenneth Langone '57 in 2002.

These speakers were not necessarily disappointing in their ability to communicate a message to the graduating class, but they certainly do not reflect the academic nature of the University, or the requisites of a recipient of the Award of Merit.

The University has the ability to entice speakers more comparable to those of the Adams era—this academic year alone has witnessed great intellectuals like Nobel Prize winner Toni Morrison and philosopher Stanley Cavell. So why are we unable to acquire such speakers for the Commencement address?

The Commencement committee must actively search for an appropriate speaker in the same way that a distinguished scholar such as Morrison was acquired as the Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters. The same process that was used in securing Morrison should be employed in securing a Commencement speaker.

Acquiring a speaker that will adequately represent the intellectual pursuits of the University is also a full-time public relations task that cannot fall largely on the shoulders of senior class representatives. The senior class should be actively engaged in the selection of their speaker—providing suggestions of whom the class wants and making the final decision of whom it will be is the responsibility of the class—but securing and contracting the speakers should be the responsibility of the faculty members, administrators and public relations representatives on the committee.

The displeasure of faculty and students alike indicates that the campus is in agreement on the type of speaker it wishes to have address the graduating class, and the University has shown that it is able to acquire such a speaker for other occasions during the academic year. Hopefully, the Class of 2004 Commencement committee will be cognizant of the need to utilize the abilities of the University to acquire the type of speaker for which the campus wishes.

Quoted out of context

To the Editor:

Until this spring, I had never been quoted in a printed publication, so it was with a certain naiveté that I answered questions from Martin Wade '06, of the Bucknell University Conservatives Club, at one of the peace vigils in mid-March. Two quotations were later printed in the March 27 issue of The Counterweight that not only misrepresented my ideas, but portrayed a negative image of the current peace movement.

My letter is not written to defame The Counterweight, but to tell readers that they should always take quotations with a grain of salt. In my case, the quotation printed was an answer to Mr. Wade's question, "Why is Bush pushing us to war?" I responded by naming several reasons, but was quoted as having said, "One reason ... Iraq has an extreme amount of oil under its surface." That, to me, is one reason, but certainly not the only one, and by employing the "...."—or quote and dot technique—there were minutes of dialogue overlooked. This caused my ideas to be misrepresented and oversimplified.

My letter is not written to defame The Counterweight, but to tell the reader that they should always take quotes with a grain of salt.

To conclude, regardless of whom your interviewer is, be it New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd or Wade, the lesson that I have learned is that your voice is at the mercy of the writer, and will be distorted at their will. And to the reader, never believe 100 percent of what you read.

Sincerely,

Kevin C. Brown '06

Feminism responds to opposition

To the Editor:

Aaron Hanlon's mere reiteration of the line of reactionary "feminism" (March 28) surprises me little. Hanlon, in conservative, anti-feminist tradition, confuses a call for political agenda with dogma. While I agree that coaltioning is essential for effective political change, this certainly does not negate the need for a feminist leadership, and a movement, with a clear political agenda and strategy.

How would coalitioning with anti-choice forces, anti-affirmative action proponents or self-proclaimed misogynists advance the cause of women?

Effective coalitioning doesn't mean the acceptance of just any political agenda. His suggestion that the feminist movement ally itself with those who work in opposition to feminist goals requires explanation. How would coalitioning with anti-choice forces, anti-affirmative action proponents or self-proclaimed misogynists advance the cause of women? From what political analysis, and in whose interest, does Hanlon make his assertions?

In the recitation of conservative "feminism," once again being a woman is confused with being a feminist. Not all of a woman's actions or beliefs necessarily correspond with feminist goals simply because she is a woman. Far from calling for a "loose" definition of feminism, I advocate political action based on objective and concrete definitions of the relationship of forces and the development of strategies therefrom. It boils down to quality versus quantity. Hanlon, along with other conservative "feminists," suggest that we abandon political analysis, agenda and strategy in favor of making "feminism" attractive to large numbers of people. What he, and they, either miss or deliberately ignore is that an effective political movement depends on common analysis, agenda and strategy which serve its cause and not the cause of its opponents.

The success of any political movement depends less on how the opposition responds than how the movement responds to its opposition. No matter how attractive, the current response of "anything goes 'feminism'" can only benefit those who are averse to ending the oppression of women.

Iraq war coverage in need of more balance

To the Editor:

Every Friday I pick up the first copy of The Bucknellian that I see, and I read it almost cover to cover on the first chance I get. While it hardly serves to ward off the common Bucknell "bubble" syndrome, I enjoy exposing myself to peer viewpoints on contemporary and pertinent issues both around the world and on this campus.

This past week, I was very disappointed in the lack of diversity reported by The Bucknellian regarding the war in Iraq. The survey results on the campus feelings about the war were very telling, revealing that 48 percent of the campus supports the war while only 31 percent is against it. The quotations and articles that followed on the next few pages certainly did not reveal that sentiment. Rather, the paper served to illustrate the fact that the opponents of the war, while in the minority, are very vocal in their criticism, and conversely the supporters seem to be rather hesitant in sharing their opinion, even though they clearly reflect a majority. I would encourage this majority to become informed on the issues and be more vocal in their opinions, and I hope that in the future, The Bucknellian will more accurately reflect the true sentiments of the campus.

I am also disappointed in the amount of space that the paper devoted to comparing the current military action in Iraq to the war in Vietnam. Operation Iraqi Freedom is very different from the war in Vietnam in many ways, an important one being that there are clear and defined objectives for being in Iraq. I am very disappointed that The Bucknellian would spend so much time creating an inappropriate association that may foment even more discontent over the current war by comparing it to an essentially different military action in the past where neither the government nor our troops were supported or respected by the majority of the nation.

Operation Iraqi Freedom is very different from the war in Vietnam in many ways, an important one being that there are clear and defined objectives for being in Iraq.

The Vietnam era is a time that this nation, and certainly a family like Bucknell, does not want to repeat. The Buckenllian would do better to be more supportive of American troops who are fighting for our freedom rather than insinuating that this campus should be treat them and this war in the same way that the Vietnam war was treated just a few decades ago.

Sincerely,

Charissa Reimer '05

Daily Item article contradicts historical facts

To the Editor:

I want to respond to claims made by Maggie Gallagher, one of the Daily Item's regularly syndicated columnists. In her op-ed piece, "Finishing a job left undone in '91,'" (March 3), she argued that the United States let go of a chance to topple Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's regime because the United Nations prevented former President George Bush from doing so. It is inaccurate to blame the United Nations for Bush Senior's decision. Rather than providing an honest account of why former President Bush did not try to destroy Hussein's regime, Gallagher wants to demonize the United Nations and all that it stands for.

Following the first Gulf War (Operation Desert Storm), the U.N. Security Council passed Resolution 678, which authorized U.S.-led coalition forces in the region to "restore international peace and security in the area." This resolution did not prevent Bush from finishing the job. Both former President Bush and former British Prime Minister John Major, our ally, argued that Hussein should be defeated by the Iraqi people and not foreign armies.

Gallagher's column is really an endorsement of the current Bush administration's new approach to international relations—preventative war, which is really a euphemism for U.S. imperialism. This imperialism is fueling anti-American hostilities abroad. In the short run, this anger will make it hard to win the support the United States needs to fight al-Qaida cells now growing in some 60 countries around the world. In the long run, the United States and all that it stands for, including liberty, democracy and justice, will be denounced.

As mere propaganda of a nation bent on ruling the world. No matter how mighty the U.S. military may be, it is extremely naive to think that it alone can rebuild Iraq, fight terrorism and spread democracy throughout the world.

Now is the time for President George W. Bush to repair our relations with the United Nations and other countries and to restore the image of the United States.

As a fair and generous nation (and not just a bullying and arrogant one!).

Sincerely,

New dean for diversity is a mistake

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Should collegiate administrations aim to have the will of their student bodies reflected in the course they set for their universities? It's safe to assume students think so. Admissions departments, seeking to lure and retain many, qualified applicants, would assumedly also adopt this opinion. Trustees, who presumably share the same objectives as the admissions department, similarly seek a student-directed path. So why then does our administration so often ignore the opinions of the student body for the sake of a faculty/administrative agenda that's altogether uninteresting to the students?

Such is the case with the latest increase in size and influence of our administrative bureaucracy through the hiring of a new dean. Yes, the collective will of the students has finally been answered; we once again have a dean specifically charged with spending funds and creative new programs to advance the simplistic agenda of diversity and multiculturalism. The position was created in the mid-1990s, but became defunct in 2001, when its occupier left to pursue other interests.

What I intend to argue is not that diversity and multiculturalism are unworthy of University offices, funds, programs, courses, etc., but rather that this specific orthodoxy is not of such high merit that it warrants a dean with the explicit duty of expanding these programs. For the students this position is intended to benefit: It never seemed during this program's two-year hiatus that students were lacking in diversity-related opportunities and/or stridently calling for the rehiring of such an administrator. Our school would be better off if this position had remained in oblivion.

He reiterated the glories that multiculturalists often allege to be pursuing, while ignoring this school of thought's true nature.

Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, informing me why the administration felt this was an important hiring, said, "Much research, including studies reported by the Business-Higher Education Forum, notes that learning is improved by a diverse learning environment—students' critical thinking, social development, creativity and problem-solving skills are all enhanced by exposure to people with varied backgrounds and ideas. If a college fails to provide a diverse learning environment, it fails to serve students in a very important way. It might as well forgo having a history department, or deny students access to computers."

In this statement, Pollock did a tremendous job explaining the nature of multiculturalism: He reiterated the glories that multiculturalists often allege to be pursuing, while ignoring this school of thought's true nature. Also, while becoming awash in its potential greatness, he improperly spoke of multiculturalism to be of the same degree of magnitude as solid fundamentals like history and access to modern technology. Higher learning has come to view the celebration of differences in people, which rightly exists under the rubric of political correctness, of such extraordinary utility, that schools direct an astonishingly large portion of their budgets toward such curriculums.

Only once the true problems with multiculturalism are unearthed do these practices become less enviable. It is, problematically, quite an intellectually lazy discipline. Simply visiting our Multicultural Affairs Web site will quickly enable you to learn exactly which people are thought to contribute to the idea of diversity. Certainly not white people—that is, unless, they have an "alternative lifestyle." Every hallmark of Western civilization is acutely ignored by multiculturalists. While Pollock said part of this motivation stemmed from a thirst for a diversity of ideas, multiculturalism's actual pointed exclusion of particular ideas, such as Western civilization ideas and values, was made decidedly clear when the Conservatives Club was denied a seat on the Multicultural Council of Presidents—apparently the only club espousing Western civilization ideas was deemed unworthy for recognition under the "inclusive" umbrella of diversity. I could request that because this dean has been hired we should also be afforded a dean specifically charged with implementing "American culture" and Western civilization offerings, but realize that that is an untenable dream as well as further unnecessary bloating of our administrative bureaucracy.

So rather than focus this argument from a neglected ideological perspective position, I'd rather point out to our new dean what his field of interest could be, rather than what it is. (I've reviewed the administration's position description and it does not include any of my forthcoming objectives. It predictably takes the same tiresome diversity line, with things like, "Serve as a facilitator for resolution when principles of inclusive living and mutual tolerance are violated and threatened.")

While the disciples of diversity are content with merely telling people that other people are great because they are different, much more can and should be taking place along this academic avenue. There are in fact some serious issues of diversity worthy of researching with some very serious scholarship. Multicultural academics should not suffice with proclaiming that all cultures, ethnicities, races, sexualities and every other such thing under the sun are all equal. They should instead intensely focus on issues that directly affect us and are rooted in societal differences.

Take the Middle East, for instance. While American college campuses were so enraptured in their celebration of an Arabic culture that so vastly differed from our own, terrorists were plotting to kill as many of us as possible. While the Taliban may have been one of the better institutions of fulfilling a society prescribed by the Quran, it was also quite the suitable breeding ground for anti-Western terrorism. Societies that grant no protections for democracy, tolerance and civil liberties will invariably encounter the occasional warlord uprising or societal collapse. Most governments have not yet allowed women to enter the 20th century, let alone the 21st. Why not ask how an Islamic society can exist without these problems? How can the Middle East exist in the current arrangement, which demands the coalescing of divergent national interests, such as Israel? We need to study not just what some of these societies do right, but what they do wrong—to accept all as unequivocally equal with our own is a monumental fraud and hardly helpful to further exploring issues of multiculturalism.

Again, why not abandon the doctrine of ubiquitous parity for a second, and take a look at how different cultures utilize their militaries. Ours is a volunteer force, bound together with shared values and built upon lengthy traditions. Every imaginable race wears our uniform, but on the battlefield, a sense of loyalty, teamwork and cohesion propels them to look after and save one another from danger. Diversity is often rescued through American militaristic endeavors—saving Jews from Nazism, Muslims from Milosevic, the religious from communism and, now, the Kurds, Shiites and others from the Ba'athe party. A would-be suicide bomber surrendered this week in Iraq, saying a member of the Fedayeen told him that either they would kill him, the Brits would kill him or he could die honorably as a suicide bomber. Their military arises from a conscript "kill them or we'll kill you" practice, and is utilized for conquest, oppression and the protection of tyrannical power. Our military is an institution that's appreciated when their services become necessary; whereas often the case elsewhere, the military defines the society.

While I wonder whether this new dean will ever seek to explore these diversity-related issues with serious intent, I'm still troubled that I'm pondering such a query. If this hiring had come in response to the interests of students, that'd be fine—but it didn't. The administration seemed to know that the vast majority of students viewed the "living wage" campaign unfavorably, so they put it towards an electoral referendum, where the campaign was seemingly put to rest after a sound defeat. If the administration was truly working in the interests of the students, it would do the same with this position. In this time of a strained University budget, resources should be dispersed as meticulously as possible, never allocating tens of thousands on something that is wildly unpopular. I contend that this position is unnecessary, unpopular and a waste of our limited funds. Now, does our administration have the gall to try and prove me wrong?

The sweet omelet of democracy

We should be proud, as Americans, that our president has had the undying courage to stand up to the world, amid millions of protesters worldwide, to do the humanitarian thing: bomb Iraq. But, please, stick to the correct terminology—we're "liberating" Iraq.

And now our servicemen and -women, our fellow American brothers and sisters, are fighting for our liberties as Americans—free speech, the right to bear arms, things that make Americans better than the rest of the world. Even if you are an unwashed peacenik hippie, the military is fighting bullet for bullet, limb for limb with the Iraqis to preserve the freedoms that make this the greatest democracy money can buy. And as Americans, since Operation Iraqi Freedom (as opposed to the war "on" Iraq) is now underway, it is our duty to avoid bringing up the following things:

Why do we declare that we are fighting to liberate Iraq from the oppressive regime of President Saddam Hussein when we have presently and historically shown that we have no interest in promoting human rights throughout the world? The dictatorial regime of Augusto Pinochet, the Vietnam War, Guatemala, Laos, Cambodia and the Iran-Contra Affair—though they may seem like perfectly good examples of events in which millions of humans died in the name of the anti-communist ideology, as opposed to human rights or humanitarianism, our nation is at war, so you should support your president!

We should also not bring up the fact that the United States armed Hussein and the Iraqi military in the 1980s to fight Iran, when it served the U.S. government's geopolitical and economic interests to do so. Such a comment would be incredibly inappropriate at this time. America is fighting to liberate the Iraqi nation from Hussein's dictatorship and to install of an American dictatorship. The bombs and bullets are flying, Operation Iraqi Liberation is already under way, so there's no point in bringing that up—it's not like we could learn from our mistakes or something. If we really care about our men and women in uniform, we must show it by pledging unquestioned support to the man who is putting them in harm's way.

And while we're at it, here are a few more things we wouldn't do well to bring up: the inevitability of heightened hatred of the United States; increased levels of terrorism worldwide; political destabilization of the Middle East; the stranglehold on news coverage by elite, sensationalist media agencies; other alternatives to lobbing cruise missiles at people from 600 miles away; the Constitution. I mean, seriously, folks. Fox News is America's most popular and most highly-rated news show, and if we can't trust them, who can we trust? I say, they haven't brought these things up, so how important could they be? I trust these guys with my nightly news!

But man, I can't wait for the sequel to Operation Iraqi Freedom, it's going to be killer—Operation Philippine Freedom, Operation Afghan Freedom III, Operation Azerbaijani Freedom, Operation Colombian Freedom, Operation Eritrean Freedom, Operation Rwandan Freedom, Operation Turkish Freedom and Operation Uzbekistani Freedom. And the surprise twist, 1 hear, is that these dictatorships in the Coalition of the Willing that practice torture of dissidents find that they've been targeted by Rule-the-World Productions as well (you don't support torture, do you?). All I can say is that it's too bad Operation American Freedom flopped, I thought that was going to be a good one.

And what's all this about stolen civil liberties? I mean, c'mon guys. Take one for the team. It's not like you ever really used your privacy, and if you were, you're probably a plotting terrorist anyways. I mean, I don't mind the protesting, just as long as, you know, I don't have to see it—they should do it, like, in their own homes or something, somewhere out of my way. It's annoying seeing these people not supporting the troops, saying that there are better methods of deposing Hussein than sacrificing American lives. How would that make you feel if you were on the front line being shot at and someone told you that you didn't have to? I wish the Patriot Act I or II or the Department of Homeland Security would do something to shut these people up....

And in any case, there are perfectly good counterarguments to the ridiculous criticisms of our nation's actions. 1. C'mon. 2. War is a fact of life. 3. Don't spout your anti-American sentiments here! As The Counterweight said, we're dealing with "the mass-murdering, palace-dwelling kleptocracy that has sustained itself at the direct expense of its people." (I know. It's hard to tell out of context, but they are talking about Hussein, not the Bush administration). Gotta love Republicans, always hatching some hairbrained scheme.

"Dissent is a crucial part of political discourse in a free country," The Counterweight claims. "Anyone who wants to has every right to march around campus with his 'Bush is the real terrorist' placard. But the bottom line is that no one should."

And what's the deal with all this rhetoric I keep hearing about innocent people's lives coming to a premature and brutal end? Please. That's not even close to true. Those stupid peacenik hippies are so detached from the reality of war. I mean, really guys. C'mon. War is a fact of life. Don't spout your anti-American sentiments here!

I mean, it's like the old saying goes—you have to break a few eggs in order to make an omelet. Right? So if you have to liberate a few thousand civilian eggs from their shells in order to make the sweet omelet of democracy, then so be it. To not do so would be un-American.

Anti-war sentiment ignores history's lessons

As a member of the University community who thinks he is at least slightly educated regarding the current situation in Iraq, I have found it very hard to sit by without expressing some sort of opinion about where I stand on the current conflict. While I am no proponent war, I do support the U.S. administration in initiating military action in Iraq. The amount of vocal opposition to the war, from Hollywood stars to high school students around the nation, shocks and disappoints me.

It seems that the recurring argument against the war follows one of two paths: Either the opposition dislikes the United States' current administration, or it is against war in general, regardless of the situation.

Considering the first group, I find it very difficult to accept that people are so factually ignorant that they attack our leaders solely based on political party or agenda. For 12 years, the United States, and the rest of the world, has tried unsuccessfully to take nonviolent measures in order to maintain security within our country and abroad. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has not complied to any acceptable degree with the sanctions and requests presented to him by the United Nations, and to say that this war was a hasty act of a vengeful president simply disregards the truth leading up to the day of action.

In response to those who oppose all war, I can respect and even accept such ideals. In a perfect world in which verbal negotiations always worked and even the most volatile of leaders acknowledged and accepted the concerns of other nations, war would be an unnecessary act. There is no way to deny that war is a terrible state in which to live. We live in a time when individuals are willing to die in return for committing acts of mass destruction and terror—we all lived through that on Sept. 11, 2001. Little can be done to combat those who do not fear death. It is because of this fact that I feel military action is warranted when the lives of Americans and others around the globe are threatened because of the suicidal, animalistic and uncaring attitudes that those responsible for such acts of terror and violence hold.

I hold no personal stock in the current conflict. With the exception of a handful of friends and family members of those I know, I have no personal connection with anyone currently serving our country in Iraq. I take solace in knowing that the initial goals of the Bush administration in dealing with the conflict in the only way necessary at this point in time have been met: civilian casualties have been minimal, our troops have been equipped with the safest and most advanced tools and technology and, so far, no one has been left behind. The rescue of rescued U.S. POW Pfc. Jessica Lynch supported my beliefs.

In any conflict, there will be opposition to the ideas held by our government, but you must consider past history before building a solid opposition on its acts. The thousands of young people killed in Vietnam can be attributed, at least on an emotional level, to the utter lack of support our troops received from many groups in America. Soldiers returned to jeering protesters, many of whom probably had no idea of the atrocities occurring under the Vietnamese government prior to our involvement. Adolf Hitler's homicidal tendencies rose to the point of reshaping an entire ethnicity of people, and probably could have been avoided had it not been for the world's most powerful force getting involved a little too late.

The military action taken in Afghanistan after Sept. 11 was, for the most part, supported, because it was in response to a despicable, cowardly act that affected so many innocent lives within our nation. Our leaders believe that Hussein has the capability of incurring similar damages in our country and abroad, and therefore decided to act in the only way that would guarantee the safety of the human race. In all honesty, they know more than any of us could ever hope to, and I trust their judgment.

Personally, I am not willing to wait until a similar incident occurs at the hands of Iraq's capricious dictator before I give my support to an administration that has kept my, and your, best interests as its No. 1 priority.

U.S. rebuilding of post-war Iraq off to a disturbing start

By Michael Niebauer

It is good to have friends in high places. In January, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld picked a friend and fellow corporate leader, Jay Monogomery Garner, "on leave" from L-3 Communications, to take the new position at the Iraq Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance. The name of this organization alone is a bureaucrat's dream, or just intimidating enough to keep people from asking what their policies really are. This means that Garner will be the man in charge of all things of economic and political importance after the hostilities end in Iraq. According to the Guardian newspaper, Garner's former company recently won a $1.3 billion contract to provide "logistical projects" to U.S. special operations forces. Garner is currently president of SY Technology, which makes missiles systems. Since Garner's expertise and weapons systems were instrumental in the "shock and awe" bombing and targeting operations against Iraq, it is ironic that he will be in charge of the rebuilding of much of what he helped to destroy ... I mean liberate! Garner's qualifications in reconstruction and humanitarian assistance are a mystery to many. Perhaps Rumsfeld can answer the "how and why" of this appointment at his next news conference, but don't bet on anyone asking the question. War is a great time for irony as the post-war gravy train gathers momentum and just keeps giving to friends and campaign contributors alike.

According to Molly Ivins, a syndicated columnist, the U.S. Agency for International Development has invited four groups to bid on a $900 million engineering contract in post-war Iraq. This is not an open bid. The group is bidding as a team, supposedly to facilitate speed and efficiency in the reconstruction effort; or is it to avoid attention and appropriate public scrutiny during a real-time televised war? The bidding group includes Bechtel, Kellogg Brown and Root, a Halliburton subsidiary and U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney's old company and Fluor Corporation working in unison. According to The Wall Street Journal and Ivins, "These companies combined to give political contributions totaling 2.8 million between 1999 and 2002, two-thirds going to the Republicans. Bechtel proudly accounts for 1.3 million of these contributions alone. These are lucrative returns on their minimal investments in government indeed when one considers what contracts are to come."

Ivins said, "Mr. Garner's Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian assistance has plans to get Iraqi children in school and distribute school supplies with a $100 million dollar contract. The plan includes five pilot programs for 'accelerated learning' that will become Iraq's national education program within a year." We have not fully funded the president's over-hyped national domestic education program, "No Child Left Behind," yet. Perhaps, this grand scheme will be called "No Iraqi Child Left Behind." Let's hope they have better luck getting fully funded than educators in public schools in the United States. Ivins said, rightly questioning this optimistic plan, "I hate to rain on the administrations parade, but we're not even out of Afghanistan after more than a year, and that is a much smaller job. In fact we don't seem to have much control of Afghanistan beyond Kabul." Ironically, Iran is putting more funds into Afghanistan this year than the United States and the opium production is back to pre-Taliban levels, according to the CIA Factbook. Nation-building is not for the militarily or politically distracted or the financially and recession-wracked superpower we are at the moment. Optimistic plans lack credibility at this time, except for corporate contributors to the cause of gaining post-war reconstruction market share in Iraq.

The worry is that the United States will lose patience with Iraq's reconstruction needs after a few months or years, not unlike Afghanistan.

The worry is that the United States will lose patience with Iraq's reconstruction needs after a few months or years, not unlike Afghanistan. Our troops still personally guard Afghan president Hamid Karsai from armed dissidents in the streets of Kabul. Iraq is much larger with 23 million people to feed, clothe and provide for as the United States undertakes a total restructuring of an occupied country. With the whole world watching and waiting (many countries are hoping we fail), ironically, the United States will be asking for U.N. help sooner or later. Will Garner still be around to cooperate with the United Nations or will another friend of Rumsfeld be in charge by then? Either way, the White House has a long list of friendly political contributors to satisfy and there is an election coming up as campaigning costs rise.

Former U.S. President Harry Truman gained national prominence as a junior senator by overseeing the performance and investigating government overcharging by contractors during World War II. It makes you wonder who is watching these corporate entities and "friendly appointees" in this super-charged political environment. Truman knew from his days as a local official in Missouri about shady dealings, graft and corruption. Let's hope these characters don't betray our trust only because we are distracted at the moment. It is good to have friends, but our nation shouldn't have to unnecessarily pay for the relationships of the well connected.

Democrats seek challenger

By Michelle Johnson
Staff Writer

The race is on. Democratic presidential hopefuls are in the middle of a heated battle to raise funds for the 2004 primaries. There are currently nine candidates contending for the coveted Democratic nomination.

With the April 15 filing deadline for the first quarter quickly approaching, many of the candidates are releasing preliminary totals. The first quarter runs from January to March and candidates are required by federal law to report their earnings to the Federal Election Commission.

According to The New York Times, Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., is leading in the fundraising totals with $7.4 million at his disposal so far. Following closely behind is Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who has amassed a total of $7 million for his campaign.

This came as a surprise to many party insiders who thought that Kerry would be the leader in the first quarter earnings. The Washington Post reported that Kerry is the richest member of Congress and that his family assets are valued at roughly $550 million. Kerry's wife inherited much of this fortune in 1991 when her former husband, Sen. H. John Heinz, died in a plane crash. Kerry ruled out the possibility of using a significant amount of this money for his campaign.

"It would be a contradiction. I said to people long ago and I held to this during my Senate campaign, I came to politics based on my own initiative and my own effort to raise money and that's the way I want to finish my life in politics," Kerry said, according to The Washington Post.

In third place for fundraising is Rep. Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., who was House Democratic leader from 1995 until the end of last year, making him a strong early contender for the nomination. Gephardt reportedly raised $3.6 million, $2.4 million of which he transferred from his congressional fundraising committee to his current campaign. His poor showing in comparison with Edwards and Kerry have some party insiders questioning his ability to successfully make the transition from House leader to presidential candidate, according to The New York Times.

The Washington Post reported that former vice presidential nominee Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., who began fundraising after many of the other presidential hopefuls, rounds out the top four with approximately $3 million earned during the first quarter. 70 percent of that was raised in the month of March alone.

Craig Smith, Lieberman's campaign manager, is optimistic. "I'm tremendously proud of our growing strength. Once our fundraising operation was in place, we hit our stride," Smith said, according to The Washington Post.

Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., who is also the former governor of Florida, got a late start on fundraising. Graham had heart surgery on Jan. 31 and officially entered the race in late February. He compensated for lost time by acquiring a little over $1 million. He is also planning trips to California and New Hampshire to garner direct mail base. Graham is effectively using phone solicitation and Dean's strong anti-war sentiment appeals to critics of the war in Iraq, many of whom are online and have given contributions via this method.

Candidates are expected to need $15 to $20 million by the end of the year in order to be viewed as serious contestants for the nomination. To attain this goal, some of the Democratic presidential hopefuls are considering refusing public matching funds. This would allow them to exceed the $44 million spending limit imposed on those who accept the funds. Gephardt and Lieberman have not ruled out such action. Kerry is also being encouraged by his strategists to choose this option.

Democrats are looking for someone who can present a challenge to President George W. Bush, who is believed to be capable of raising an estimated $250 million for his campaign, according to The Washington Post.

At the end of the first quarter of fundraising, Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., is the leading candidate in pursuit of the Democratic presidential nomination for the 2004 elections. He has raised $7.4 million for his campaign.

Three other Democratic candidates up for nomination are former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean is still in the running with $2.6 million. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, former Sen. Carol Mosely Braun, D-Ill., and civil rights activist Al Sharpton, none of whom have released their totals yet, according to The New York Times.

The presidential hopeful have all employed their own strategies to raise campaign funds. The Washington Post reported that Kerry has the strongest funds, according to CNN.com.

Preserving Iraq

International community concerned about protecting Iraqi oil sovereignty

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Currently, the subject on the minds of everyone in the Bush and Blair administrations and the United Nations is the reconstruction of Iraq once the war is completed.

The press is asking who will govern and how the rule will change hands from Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to the new government that replaces him in Baghdad. The United Nations wants to help restore peace and bring humanitarian aid to the Iraqi people. Perhaps most importantly, oil businesses around the world await the signal to step in and rebuild the key industry in Iraq.

According to a report in The Wall Street Journal, "Some of the world's largest oil companies have lined up to tap Iraq's vast petroleum potential, with proven oil reserves of 112 billion barrels. With the known reserves second only to Saudi Arabia, there exist potential resources that are double that. Another prime attraction to these companies: Iraq's oil production costs are among the lowest in the world, making for fat margins."

In a MSNBC.com report President of Cambridge Energy Research Associates Daniel Yergin said, "Estimates Iraq could up that to 6 million barrels a day by 2010 ... [although] it's currently estimated it could take $5 to 7 billion and about two years to get the industry back to where it was. It's an investment that's required in oil wells, pipelines, ports—the whole infrastructure of the industry."

What will be the rebuilding cost? There are many estimates taking into consideration the huge number of variables present in the rebuilding of Iraq.

The estimated cost is "upwards of $20 billion a year for many years for the requirements of post-conflict peace and stability as well as reconstruction in post-war Iraq," said Eric Schwartz, director of the post-war Iraq task force at the Council of Foreign Relations on MSNBC.com. "Under the best of circumstances, we're not going to create a Switzerland in the Persian Gulf in six months. It's not going to happen."

Time may be the most important variable in the rebuilding. No one knows how long it will take.

A majority of the costs for this rebuilding will be paid for by those oil reserves. Iraq was producing 3-3.5 million barrels a day at its height, and some believe that the country can produce up to 6 million barrels a day in the future, MSNBC.com reported. Officials are debating how best to use that oil to fund rebuilding.

According to The Washington Post, Russia, France, Germany and other key Security Council members are seeking to preserve U.N. management of the Iraqi oil industry. The Security Council president, Adolfo Aguilar Zinser of Mexico, told reporters that the 15-nation council has voiced its commitment to the principle that "Iraq's oil belongs to the Iraqis," during a discussion on the fate of Iraq's oil industry.

"The council must make an effort to preserve ... Iraq's sovereignty over its oil," Zinser said to The Washington Post.

The Bush administration sees the process unfolding in the following way, according to The Washington Post. First, the coalition forces in the region will direct reconstruction and security. Second, an interim government of Iraqis and Iraqi exiles who work or have worked in the oil industry will be installed in Baghdad. These personnel know the important industry in Iraq. Finally, "Iraq's long-term oil policies would be set by a permanent government chosen by Iraqis."

The oil industry will have to deal with the incoming Iraqi interim authority, a body over which the United Nations wants more control. The United Nations does not trust U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair to undertake this task properly. Bush and Blair recently discussed the post-war situation in Iraq during a summit held in Northern Ireland.

"The White House has made it clear that it will seek and welcome financial assistance, humanitarian aid and logistical support in post-war Iraq from other countries and international institutions including the United Nations," The New York Times reported. "It is also grappling with how long to keep American troops in Iraq, and whether there will be a need for a peacekeeping force, possibly provided by NATO, which like the United Nations was deeply divided by Mr. Bush's hard line against Iraq."

How Iraqi rebuilding will work remains to be seen. There will be a large amount of debate over the details and governments. What happens in Iraq will not affect the world's oil industry. With a reserve underneath Iraq that rivals only Saudi Arabia, the world market will see new supplies soon after the war is over.

"Some of the world's largest oil companies have lined up to tap Iraq's vast petroleum potential, with proven oil reserves of 112 billion barrels. With the known reserves second only to Saudi Arabia, there exist potential resources that are double that. Another prime attraction to these companies: Iraq's oil production costs are among the lowest in the world, making for fat margins."

U.K. deports Muslim imam

Imam Abu Hamza al-Masri leads a mosque suspected of being connected with al Qaida

By Emma Post
Staff Writer

On April 5, Great Britain deported the radical Imam Abu Hamza al-Masri. The New York Times reported that David Blunkett, British Home Secretary, sent Masri a letter that withdrew his citizenship and said that he had 10 days to appeal or be deported.

Masri's expulsion was the first move taken under new laws empowering the British government to take away the British citizenship of immigrants with dual nationalities if their intentions threaten national interests.

The deportation came after many newspapers and members of parliament called for Masri's expulsion since new evidence had been found that Masri was persuading young British Muslims to wage holy war against the West. Masri, as an imam, which is a recognized religious leader of Shi'ite Islam, ran the Finsbury Park mosque in northern London. This mosque was suspected of being a recruiting ground for fundamentalist Islam and al Qaida.

Blunkett said that the deportation decision was founded on the belief that the cleric encouraged people "to take part in the jihad and fight us [the British] overseas."

"If you encourage, support, advise, help people to take up training, if you facilitate them, then, of course, that takes you right over the boundary," Blunkett said to The New York Times.

Zacarias Moussaoui, a French citizen of Moroccan descent who was arrested and faces conspiracy charges in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks, and Richard C. Reid, the Briton who pleaded guilty to having tried to blow up a Miami-bound jetliner en route from Paris in December 2001 with explosives hidden in his shoes, worshiped at Masri's mosque prior to their terrorist activities.

Many British Muslims have criticized Masri and his use of a religious site to promote violence and hatred. But Britain, which is home to a diverse population and relatively relaxed immigration policies, in addition to being a transportation hub and a financial center, has been a breeding ground for Islamic militants. As a result of this reputation, reinforced by the fact that many British Muslims have been discovered fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, French investigators have nicknamed the British capital "Londonistan."

Masri, a former nightclub bouncer, was born in Egypt, but became a citizen after moving to Britain in 1979 and marrying a British woman. He has one eye and wears two hooks for his hands because they were blown off by landmines in Afghanistan. Masri supports Osama bin Laden as well as the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to The New York Times, he declared the crew of the space shuttle Columbia a "trinity of evil" who were punished by God and deserved death because the shuttle consisted of five Americans, an Indian Hindu and an Israeli. He was removed from his post at the mosque for this comment.

In reference to U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Masri said at the Finsbury mosque on April 4, "Under the name of freedom, they enslave other nations. And under the name of peace, they wage war," reported The Washington Post.

Blunkett denied to the BBC that he intends to use his new powers to arrest and deport other radical clerics and said that the proceedings against Masri involved his actions, not his expressed opinions.

"We are not talking about a bigmouth shouting off," Blunkett said, according to The New York Times. "Irritating though that is, they have the right to do so."

Masri's lawyer says that he plans to appeal the deportation.

Florida fears higher education of terrorists

Florida Rep. Dick Kravitz proposes ban on financial aid to international students coming from "terrorist nations"

By Kyle Schoeneman
Writer

The world of higher education will never be the same in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Homeland security turns its attention now to international students, due to the fact that three of the alleged 19 hijackers of Sept. 11 posed as university students.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) is currently keeping a watchful eye on student visas. All colleges and universities are required to enter their international students in a national computer network known as the Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS). Despite the measures that are being taken in the name of security, some lawmakers find it appropriate to further these precautions by eliminating aid to certain students to discourage them from attending American colleges and universities.

A recent bill in the Florida legislature proposes the ban of state aid to international students who are from countries that support terrorism. Republican State Rep. Dick Kravitz formulated the bill.

"In these hard times we need to put as much taxpayer money as possible into programs for residents of the state of Florida who are citizens," Kravitz said, according to CNN.

Kravitz, a former insurance agent, said that the United States is educating students who will possibly help their native lands oppose the United States. There are no other states with this type of proposal.

According to CNN, the bill would ban state aid to international students from the State Department's list of "terrorist nations," including Iran, Iraq, Syria, Sudan, Libya, North Korea and Cuba. Cuba was later removed from the list due to Florida's large number of Cuban immigrants.

According to the Department of Education, state universities and colleges spent a mere $308,717 in 2001 and 2002 to provide financial aid for 822 students from the original seven countries on the list.

The bill has been receiving a lot of attention lately due to the recent arrest of Sami Al-Arian, a professor at the University of South Florida. According to CNN, Al-Arian is described as the North American leader of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

The bill has caused discontent among civil rights defenders. President of the Muslim Students Association at Florida State University Hadia Mubarak said that the bill would target only Islamic students.

"What he [Kravitz] is saying is if you're born in Libya or Syria you're more likely to be a terrorist than anyone else. I can't think of anything more inflammatory," Mubarak said, according to The Naples Daily News.

—Hadia Mubarak, president of the Muslim Students Association at Florida State University*

The Council on American-Islamic Relations also has spoken out against the bill. According to The San Francisco Chronicle, the council's spokesman, Ahmed Bedier, claimed that students from the listed nations are "innocent bystanders and have nothing to do with terrorism."

Mubarak and other strong opponents of the bill claim educational opportunities for foreign students are the best hope for changing their home countries.

"These students become the ambassadors of American values," Mubarak said to The Naples Daily News.

Kravitz said that the foreign students would not help this country because their visas require them to return home after graduation. When they return home, it is possible for them to support terrorism with their newly acquired knowledge. Kravitz made the claim that one of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's top biological weapons scientists is a woman who was educated at the University of Missouri, The Naples Daily News reported.

"They are going back to countries whose regimes are out to get us," Kravitz said, according to The Naples Daily News.

When confronted in 2001, Florida Republican Gov. Jeb Bush expressed skepticism about the bill.

"Let's be thoughtful about this and not overreact. Florida's strength is its diversity," Bush said, according to The Naples Daily News.

The governor was wary of the idea of possibly keeping top students out of Florida's universities.

Last year, Kravitz was unable to get his bill passed, but the bill got approval from the House Higher Education Committee with a vote of 6-0, according to CNN. The bill still needs the approval from four more committees, which is unlikely to occur.

As Hussein falls, Iraqi future remains uncertain

U.S. troops destroy a statue of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in Baghdad. As coalition forces come closer to achieving their goals of Operation Iraqi Freedom, debate heats up as to who should be responsible for Iraq's future; U.S. George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair disagree on the role the United Nations should play in post-war Iraq.

By Devin Gangi
Writer

Ever since the war with Iraq began roughly two weeks ago, British Prime Minister Tony Blair has been negotiating constantly with the White House over how to handle a post-war Iraq, through both peacekeeping forces and setting up a suitable government.

Blair has been consistently at odds with U.S. President George W. Bush in determining what role the United Nations should play in constructing a new regime. Blair has repeatedly called for a swift transition to domestic Iraqi rule after Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has been ousted, with the United Nations heavily involved in the construction of a new democratic government.

"We're not saying that the future of Iraq should be governed by the Americans and the British, we're saying the future of Iraq should be governed by the Iraqi people," Blair said to the BBC.

The White House, on the other hand, is doubtful about the future role of the United Nations and the speed with which power should be handed over to a new Iraqi authority. These reservations by the Bush administration are not surprising, given the failure of diplomacy in the U.N. Security Council.

This developing rift has cast Britain in the unenviable role of trying to bring the United States and Europe together on post-war policy. France, Germany and Russia have all emphasized that they want strong U.N. involvement in post-war Iraq. These policy differences have given Blair an unattractive choice: Either yield to the Bush administration's often unilateral decisions or side with his European allies in defending the role of the United Nations.

Not only have Blair's European neighbors balked at his pro-war stance, but Blair has faced considerable internal pressure as well. Most of this pressure has come not from opposition parties, but from his own Labour Party members, who collectively felt that only a U.N.-sanctioned war against Iraq would be acceptable, according to CNN. In the British parliamentary system, prime ministers are just as likely to be removed from office by their own party members as by those of the opposition party.

Blair has risked his job in supporting Bush and staked his political career on a quick, successful war with Iraq. Blair initially threw in his support with the United States for the simple reason that whatever America wants, America usually gets. He figures that it is better to be an ally of the likely victor and share the spoils of war than to watch from the sideline and draw potential American animosity.

According to CNN, one of Blair's main long-term goals is to try and make Britain the center of a dependable and significant European Union. Being both on the winning side and successfully reconciling European and American differences after the war would go a long way toward achieving that goal.

If the war were to go badly, France and Germany would likely shape the European Union's future policy, and Blair would probably be out of office. If Blair cannot convince the United States to let the United Nations have a prominent rebuilding role in Iraq, his government will likely be politically isolated from the rest of Europe.

Blair has also become increasingly nervous over the Bush administration's military intentions after the war for Iraq. U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has recently made several threatening remarks towards Syria and Iran, leading to European speculation that the United States' operations in the Middle East are far from over. As much as British backing for an unsanctioned war against Iraq was unacceptable domestically and internationally for Blair, further attacks would be even more so.

Blair remains hopeful that matters can be worked out to the benefit of all parties.

"The U.S. needs a lot of international money for Iraq's reconstruction, and it needs support in the region to maintain its legitimacy there. Washington recognizes that even it, on its own, cannot fund the humanitarian and reconstruction effort," Blair said, according to The Financial Times.

Blair met with Bush Monday in Northern Ireland with the war and potential U.N. involvement as primary topics of conversation. Only time will tell if Blair's and Bush's efforts to reach an acceptable agreement to the international community, which would also save Blair's job, will succeed.

Abroad Perspective: Sevilla, Spain

The day I arrived in Sevilla, Spain, I took a little nap in my apartment and then set out on foot with my new roommate Sarah and our señora (hostmother) Rosa to get a taste of the city.

Rosa guided us through our neighborhood to the Parque de Maria Luisa. We entered the park and walked along the path flanked by towering palm trees and budding orange trees. Later I would discover the enormity of the park with its museums, fountains, pathways and ponds. I would sit reading, watching the goofy doves and pigeons and watching the little dogs, kids and couples stroll by.

The path continued right by what came to be one of my favorite sights of Sevilla, the Plaza de España. It is no surprise that this gorgeous building is a popular place where commercials and movies like "Star Wars: Attack of the Clones" are filmed. Throughout my semester, I would spend hours sitting in the plaza listening to the carriages trot around the fountain, watching the newlyweds get their pictures taken, writing in my journal, watching the sunset and taking it all in.

Within about 20 minutes we arrived at La Universidad de Sevilla, where I would be studying through the Sweet Briar Junior Year in Spain Program (Sweet Briar JYS). That was the enjoyable walk I would take every day to get to my classes.

We continued walking to the Torre de Oro, which sits beside the Guadalquivir River. We walked along the river and then up to the bullring, the Real Maestranza de Sevilla. Later I would sit inside the bullring among a full crowd and experience a bullfight firsthand. I would contemplate the brutal artistry of the struggle between man and beast and cheer and gasp right along with the locals.

We circled back in toward the center of the city, where I got my first glimpse of the cathedral and the connecting Muslim prayer tower, the Giralda. We sat down for tapas (a snack) outside at a bar right across from the cathedral and began to get to know one another. It was starting to get late so we caught a bus back to our apartment.

As I sat in my bed that night, I was awestruck that this exotic paradise was going to be my new home for the next four months. I knew that night that I had made the right decision to study in Sevilla and that I was going to have an amazing semester. Whatever nervousness I had felt disappeared upon meeting my welcoming family, my fun and friendly roommate and my beautiful new city. I felt at home right from the beginning.

One of the best ways to improve your language skills and get to know another culture is to live with a host family. I lived with a family of five including the mother Rosa, father Pedro, daughters Maria (27) and Lucía (19), son Pedro (24) and their little dog, Nico. While I spent most of my time outside of the house experiencing all that Spain has to offer, it was always nice to come back home for real Spanish meals cooked by Rosa, who just happened to be a private caterer. She generally cooked very well despite the occasional espinaca con garbanzos (spinach and garbanzo beans). I was especially a fan of her paella and tortilla española, two common Spanish dishes.

During meals we would customarily chat about a diverse array of topics from everyday events and stories to politics, holidays, customs, food, history and current events, with food taking the prize for the most frequent topic of conversation. I was usually able to follow the conversation very well, but it could be difficult at times due to people's Sevillan accents. The people of southern Spain don't enunciate their words clearly and they tend to drop consonants and word endings. Even native speakers from other Spanish-speaking countries or from other parts of Spain would assure me not to worry—they too had trouble understanding the Sevillanos.

After three weeks of orientation, we registered for our classes at La Universidad de Sevilla. I had the opportunity to take many unique and intriguing classes including a class about flamenco dancing, its characteristics, history and different forms; a class on Spanish society and culture; a class about the Muslims, Christians and Jews living in medieval Spain; and a seminar about Spain and the European Union that was offered by Sweet Briar JYS. The professors were all very knowledgeable and accessible to American students. I enjoyed learning about Spanish history and culture in the classroom and then being able to see and experience what I was learning firsthand in my daily life.

Outside of the classroom, I was able to participate in many different activities that greatly enhanced my experience. With the help of Sweet Briar JYS, I was set up with an internship helping out in a class of 4-year-olds at a local grade school. Every Wednesday morning that I came into class, a few students would run toward me and hug my legs—pretty soon I was being swarmed by almost the entire class! Once they had calmed down again, I would go around giving individual help with the day's lesson. The English lesson was first so I would test the students on the colors and the English words for various objects. My favorite day was when they learned how to say "trick or treat," but it sounded more like "chicky chi."

One of my passions has always been music and I'm involved with several music groups at Bucknell. Since music is so important to me, I sought out a way to participate in music while in Spain. Fellow Bucknellian Meghann Peace '04 and I contacted a community choir director and were able to join his choir, La Asociación Coral de Sevilla. We were lucky enough to sing for a special mass as well as in a concert of Vivaldi's Gloria with excellent soloists, a harpsichord and a full orchestra. Through our experience in choir we were also able to make some new Spanish friends.

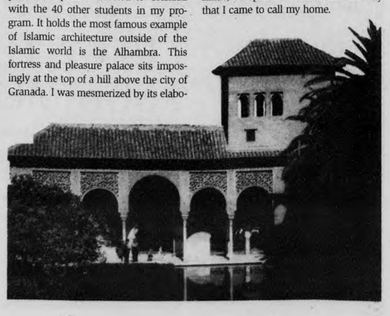
At night I would text message my friends on my beloved mobile phone and we would head to concerts, movies, bars and discotecas (dance clubs). Going to see American movies in Spain was always entertaining since they usually dub all of their movies in Spanish. It was funny to hear actors like Pierce Brosnan, Will Smith, Reese Witherspoon and Angelina Jolie "speaking" Spanish.

We would often go to bars with live flamenco music and dancing or just sit outside along the river sipping sangría and listening to the locals pull out their guitars and start playing. One night a group of people formed a circle right by us and started playing their guitars, singing, clapping and dancing. Eventually, Meghann and I were drawn into the group and clapped along with the music. What makes flamenco so unique is that it's not just something done in formal settings by professionals. While there are many talented professional groups, this group of people was not simply putting on a show for strangers. Instead, these people were getting together with friends to have a good time and express themselves through music and dance. Flamenco is a unique art form that belongs to the common people. It is completely different from anything I've experienced in the United States.

Since we only had classes Monday through Thursday, almost every Friday we would catch a bus or train to a new and exciting destination. One of our first independent excursions was to "the Rock"—that is, the Rock of Gibraltar. Contrary to popular opinion, my friends and I found Gibraltar to be much more than just a rock due to its rich historical past, culturai mix and natural beauty. One of Gibraltar's main claims to fame is the Barbary apes that roam wild around the streets. I even had one of them jump on my shoulders for a picture! But what was even more exciting about Gibraltar was its location right across the strait from Africa. I squealed with excitement upon seeing the cliffs of Morocco and waved foolishly toward my friend Sarah Gudenkauf '04 who was studying in Kenya. Many of us decided that we would have to make a return trip and cross the ocean to Morocco after seeing the African shore.

Three weeks later I did just that. Although I would have loved to venture into the real heart of Morocco, our schedules did not permit such extensive traveling, so we settled for the international and somewhat touristy coastal city of Tangier. A group of seven other students and I boarded the ferry for Tangier at the Spanish port of Algeciras. En route to Morocco we met four Spanish guys by the names of José, José, José and Paco. I guess Paco's parents didn't get the memo. They were also visiting Tangier for the weekend, so we were able to spend time together and get lots of practice on our Spanish. Ironically, one of the best experiences I had speaking Spanish and making Spanish friends was in Morocco. I will admit that some of our experiences like the snake charmer, traditional pharmacy and camel ride were a bit touristy in nature. Awakening to the sound of the Muslim prayer call being projected across the city at 5:30 a.m. was a truly authentic experience and reminded me that I was in a completely foreign culture. I have never been so thrilled to wake up at such an early hour! I was captivated by the song and caught up by such a moving experience.

I was also able to see and experience Arabic cultural influences within Spain. The Arabic influence is most apparent in the city of Granada since it was the last stronghold of the 800-year Muslim occupation of Spain. I traveled to Granada with the 40 other students in my program. It holds the most famous example of Islamic architecture outside of the Islamic world is the Alhambra. This fortress and pleasure palace sits imposingly at the top of a hill above the city of Granada. I was mesmerized by its elaborate gardens, ponds and intricate mosaics and designs. At night we wandered down a street lined with Arabic shops and cafés. One of my favorite memories is of sitting at one of these Arabic cafés chatting with friends, drinking tea, eating crêpes, listening to the Arabic music of Khaled and learning some basic Arabic phrases from our Moroccan waiter.



While I have already included some truly fabulous travel experiences, I don't know how I could write this article without mentioning Barcelona. Barcelona is a city unlike any other. The city has a vibrant feel with the portrait artists and the actors that stand dressed in colorful costumes like statues along one of Barcelona's main streets. But what really makes this city stand out is its art and architecture. Barcelona was home to some of Spain's most remarkable artists and architects, including Pablo Picasso and Antoni Gaudí, and their influence is visible throughout the city. I quickly became obsessed with Gaudí's inventive, colorful and unique modern style and visited as many of his creations as I could. The Sagrada Familia, Parc Guell and the various houses he designed invoked images of "Star Wars," Candyland and Dr. Seuss. While I loved my home in Sevilla, I had a hard time leaving Barcelona behind.

After a long night of singing at my choir concert and packing, I awoke in the early hours of the morning, called a taxi and bid Rosa farewell. As my roommate Sarah and I headed down to the street, I felt the tears well up in my eyes. While I am not usually one to show my emotions, there was no holding back. My taxi driver arrived quickly and handed me a Kleenex. Within four short months, I had some of the best experiences of my life. I will always remember the friends I made, the places I visited and the city that I came to call my home.

Bison expand first-place Patriot League lead

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

The Bucknell baseball team doesn't look much like a team that was voted to finish fifth out of six teams in the Patriot League. The Bison snagged three victories in a four-game series at Navy last weekend, losing the other game by a single run. After the near swcep of the Midshipmen, who were predicted to finish first in the league, the Bison hold a 14-7 overall record and lead the league with a 6-2 mark.

The Orange and Blue outgamed Navy twice on Saturday, 4-1 and 3-2, and then split a doubleheader on Sunday, losing a tight 2-1 decision and then shutting out the Midshipmen 2-0 in the final game of the series.

The wins also improve the Bison's away record to 6-2 since returning from spring break. Head Coach Gene Depew is enthusiastic about the successful road games.

"We feel very good about our 6-2 start on the road and are looking forward to the next few weeks," Depew said.

The series was a crucial one for the Bison, especially in light of Navy's high preseason ranking.

"In my four years on the team, there is always a more serious mood and a different kind of focus during the week leading up to the Navy series," co-captain R.J. Grant '03 said. "Navy has been picked as preseason champions the last four years, so naturally, we're going to turn up the level and leave everything we have on the field each game, each inning."

The Bison did just that, kicking off the weekend with a victory in the first game of a doubleheader on April 5. Starting pitcher Kevin Miller '04 effectively stifled Navy's offense with a one-run, three-hit complete game effort.

The Bison gave Miller a one-run cushion in the third, breaking up a scoreless game. B.J. Batterson '03 walked and advanced to second on a sacrifice by Ben Stoll '04 before scoring on a single to center field by Sam Moss '04.

The team bolstered its lead with two runs in the fifth, moving the score to 3-0. Batterson drew his second walk of the afternoon and Stoll knocked out a single. Moss then took advantage of an error, reaching base on an errant throw and loading up the bases for the Bison. Navy's third error of the day allowed Brian Day '05 to reach first as Batterson crossed the plate for Bucknell's second run of the game. Brian Hirschberg '04 sent home Stoll with a sacrifice fly to center.

Kyle Walter '06 led off the sixth inning with a single and scored from first when Batterson drilled a double into center field.

Navy attempted to chip away at the Bison's 4-0 lead in the seventh, but could only manage one run on two hits. Miller ran into a bit of trouble in the inning when the Midshipmen ripped out a triple and a single with one out in the frame, but he quickly rebounded to strike out two consecutive batters and end the game.

Miller's three seventh inning strikeout increased his strike-out total for the day to seven and his season total to 26. The win moved his record to a team-best 4-0.

Although the four runs were the most the team scored in a game all weekend, the low offensive numbers were deceptive as the weekend was full of valuable well-timed and efficient hitting. Assistant Coach Rick Ciccione said the quality of the hitting was high.

"Navy threw four very good pitchers against us, but we were able to get clutch hits in crucial situations," Ciccione said.

The second game of the day delivered more suspense than the first, as the Bison and Midshipmen took a 1-1 deadlock into the ninth inning.

Pitching proved to be the Bison's strength again, as Grant battled through eight innings, allowing just one run on six hits and striking out seven. Grant earned the win for his fourth victory of the season, while Phil Futrick '06 grabbed his fifth save of the season.

Grant went into the game confident that the Bison pitching was capable of securing victories against the tough Navy pitching staff.

"I was confident that if our hitters gave us a couple of runs in each game, we could leave Annapolis with three or four victories," Grant said.

The Bison's only scoring in the first eight frames came in the fourth inning. Stoll led off with a single and advanced to second on a Moss sacrifice. Day then sent Stoll home with a double down the left field line.

The two teams then scattered hits over the next few innings, but failed to capitalize when runners reached base. Timely hitting and excellent base running helped the Bison break up the scoring drought in the ninth inning with a two-run surge.

Austin Barrett '05 singled with two outs in the inning and Walter followed up with a hit of his own. Pinch-runner Chris Grandizio '06 and Walter then successfully orchestrated a double steal, putting runners on second and third for Phil Bunting '05. Bunting drilled his third hit of the day into center field, scoring both runners and giving the team a 3-1 lead.

In addition to his solid hitting, catcher Bunting was an integral part of the Bison's defensive success in all four games. Grant stressed the importance of Bunting's contributions to the battery and the defense.

"Besides the solid pitching, Phil Bunting caught all four games and did an amazing job gunning down [Navy's] runners and really stifling their running game," Grant said. "Sometimes Phil goes unnoticed, but he studies each hitter's tendencies and looks for flaws in their stance or swing. A good pitching staff always has a good catcher and

Lacrosse extends winning streak

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The 17th ranked Bison men's lacrosse team extended its winning streak to five games after beating 18th ranked Villanova 7-6 and Lafayette 12-5 last week at home. The team will take the longest winning streak that the University has seen since the undefeated 1996 season to West Point this Saturday where the Bison will face Army, one of the preseason favorites to win the Patriot League.

As has been the story all season, it was the Bison defense that got the job done against favored Villanova. The Orange and Blue went into the game ranked 3rd in the nation in the goals-against per game category letting up only 6.6 goals per game and were tested against the Wildcats who were number one in the category.

Villanova's offense is also one of the most potent in the nation, but the Bison responded to that too.

"You get put under a lot of pressure when a team can control the ball on offense," head coach Sid Jamieson said. "You have to have good character and not lose composure, and our defense was able to do that."

The Wildcats took a 2-0 lead just before the second half before the Bison took control and went on a 6-1 run. The key to the run was a four-goal spurt as the Bison's senior midfielders John Terracciano '03, Kelly Hogue '03 and Andrew Copelan '03 all scored in a span of 3:20 in the third quarter.

"That run was a function of momentum and how the game unfolds," Jamieson said. "We were able to utilize our midfield's skills and quickness and that helped us. But we weren't surprised that we were able to do that, it's to be expected."

"We all play defense well individually, but what is key is that our team defense works together so well that we just suffocate other teams."
—Justin Sussman '03

Chris Cara '05, the Bison's leading scorer didn't score a goal, but had five assists in the game.

"The middies were cutting to the crease well and I was able to find them," Cara said.

Goalie Justin Sussman '03 was spectacular as usual saving 12 shots including one critical one with 2:30 left in the game to ensure the Bison win. Sussman entered the game number one in the nation in save percentage with an average of .700.

"Sussman playing at the top of his game right now is a function of his having more confidence in himself after gaining so much experience," Jamieson said.

Another reason for his success has been the stingy defense in front of him that has made it very difficult for players to get off good shots on goal.

"I think what sets us apart from other teams is our preparation before games," Sussman said. "We all play defense well individually, but what is key is that our team defense works together so well that we just suffocate other teams."

The Bison defense again dominated against Lafayette in a drubbing that was the fifth time this season that the Orange and Blue have allowed five goals or fewer in a game. Again the team got help offensively from its midfield as Rob Lane '03, Terracciano and Copelan combined for five goals and seven assists.

"Overall I didn't feel like we played that well, but the middies stepped up and played really well to take it," Cara said.

Like the Villanova game it was close early before the Bison midfielders took control. The Herd lead was just one 3-2 late in

Women drop heartbreaker, 11-10

By Cecily Cairns

The Bucknell women's lacrosse team suffered another heartbreaker last weekend, falling victim to a dramatic rally by Dusquesne to lose 10-11. The Bison's three-game winning streak came to a halt with the loss, as their record fell below .500 again at 4-5. Despite the loss, the team played well and made a strong effort.

The Bison were quick to jump to a 3-0 lead, as Suzanne Raffaele '03 rifled two goals into the net in the first 10 minutes and Amy Hasler '04 scored a goal with 22 minutes, 33 seconds on the clock.

Dusquesne and Bucknell then alternated goal-scoring for the next 18 minutes, during which Victoria Field '06 and Andrea Paraud '05 both added to the Bison's total. With two minutes remaining in the half, the Orange and Blue held a 5-3 lead.

Raffaele was on a roll in the closing minutes of the half, increasing the Bison's lead to 7-3 with two unassisted goals to increase her scoring total on the day to four. The fourth of her goals came with just three seconds left in the half.

The second half was more of a battle for the Bison, as Dusquesne had a sudden resurgence in the last 30 minutes.

The Dukes scored two unanswered goals to kick off the half, narrowing the score to 7-5. Cora Preston '05 opened the lead to three when she netted a goal with 16:43 left in the game.

Another Dusquesne score and a goal by Meredith Wright '04 moved the score to 9-6 as the game entered the final six minutes of play.

Track competes at Colonials

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

Bucknell's track team produced some big results at Colonial Relays at William and Mary April 4-6, but came home with injuries. Noel Powell '04 and Lou Palma '03 led the men to 5th out of 22 schools, while Maria Garcia '04 led the women to seventh out of 18 schools.

Powell had a hand in 34 of the Bison's 63 points by winning the 100 meter dash and long jump, taking second in the 200 and leading the 4x100 and 4x200 relays to sixth place finishes. Even with those impressive performances, Powell has plenty of room for improvement as his 100m time was hindered by a stiff wind and he came up only one centimeter short of the NCAA regional mark in the long jump.

The NCAA regional qualifying time was no match for Palma, as he used a strong field in the 1500 to his advantage. Palma got in the race early and looked strong at the end, finishing third with a time of 3 minutes, 49 seconds, just 0.4 second back of the winner.

Palma was happy with his time, but not with his place. "I could have stepped out for the win, but I was afraid that if I got pushed too far outside someone could have snuck by on the inside for third place," Palma said.

Palma came back the next day to split 3:50, leading the 4x1500 relay contingent of Eric Furst '03, Bryan Johnston '03 and Wes Reinhardt '04 to fourth place.

Head Coach Kevin Donner was very pleased with many performances, but worried about health issues.

"Our men's 4x1500 ran super against great competition. Palma and Powell are our "go-to guys" right now. They are competing very well. I was also extremely happy with our three freshmen men in the 5k—[William] Duffy, [Kevin] Fortkiewicz and [Michael] Delaney. I was happy in that we beat some pretty good programs on both sides; however, I am somewhat concerned with some of the injuries we have," Donner said.

Those injuries included one the Bison's top steeplechasers on the men's side and one of the Bison's top women hurdlers.

Injuries withstanding, the women also put up some fine marks. Garcia threw the hammer over 165 feet to place second, just two feet shy of the NCAA regional mark.

Donner praised the runners.

"Our distance medley and 4x1,500 [relays] looked great as well as our 4x100. Our 4x100 ran as fast as we ran all last year and it's still relatively early in the season. [Amy] Calvo '05 and [Charity] Brady '03 ran some nice times in the 400. The competition was awesome in that event," Donner said.

Jen Marsh '05, who teamed up with Calvo, Nicki Piper '03 and Theresa Dennis '03 in the distance medley relay, was psyched about the race, but looking for better in the future.

"All members of the team ran well," Marsh said. "It was a great race. Beating great teams like Seton Hall and JMU was awesome. The key is to be happy but never be satisfied. If you're satisfied you'll never improve."

Looking ahead to this weekend, the Bison will be hosting the Bison Outdoor Classic, starting tonight with the distance carnival at 7 p.m.

"It will be exciting to compete at home," Marsh said. "We haven't run against most of the teams yet during the outdoor season. Different competition will be a good challenge. I think the team will be fired up, we'll do awesome and overall it will be a great meet."

Palma is optimistic about the men's team as well.

"I think the mid-distance guys are looking forward to the meet because we know we can run better as a group," Palma said. "The student body can come to the track meet and play in the steeple pit as long as they cheer for us."

Besides the competition, April had brought Donner an additional concern for this meet.

"Hopefully the weather can get better," Donner said.

More than just a game for Junge

Former Bucknell star carries memories of lost friends as he cruises to major-league success

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

Eric Junge, a 1999 graduate of Bucknell, knew it was an honor to be standing on the mound at Veterans Stadium last fall, staring down a major-league hitter for the first time in his career.

After all, out of the 1,000 or so players who sign a professional contract each year, only about 10 percent ever play so much as an inning in the major leagues. For 9 out of 10 aspiring minor leaguers, the dream dies at Triple A—if it even gets that far.

That Junge, an 11th-round draftee, had landed himself in the elite 10 percent would have been reason enough to cherish that mid-September evening. Not a lot of guys get a first major-league pitch.

But what Junge will always remember about his major-league debut has nothing to do with statistics or percentages. Whatever odds that he had overcome to get there weren't leading the stream of thoughts that flowed through his mind as the innings ticked by.

There was only one number that really stood out to Junge that night as he sat in the bullpen, and that was the date. Through some turn of fate, he happened to get called up on Sept. 11, the first anniversary of a day that had shattered lives and hearts all over the nation.

Clad for the first time in big-league garb, the most important feature of his attire that night wasn't the little major-league baseball logo embroidered just below the back neckline of his pinstriped jersey. It wasn't the franchise name sewn in red letters across his chest, or the letters "J-U-N-G-E" arching across his shoulder blades, or anything else that appeared on the outfit courtesy of the official league manufacturer.

It was three words inscribed by Junge himself on the side of his ballcap: Fetchet, Mello, McGinley.

Those three words—all last names—were what made his 22 pitches that night the most important inning of his career.

Baseball has long been used as a metaphor for life; sometimes it can be a very appropriate one. Sometimes, though, it isn't. Baseball is never so cruel as life has the capacity to be. Loss, in baseball, is an "L" in a boxscore. In life, loss hits a lot harder.

On a calm Tuesday morning in September of 2001, loss hit Junge particularly hard. Brutally hard.

The attack on our nation that took place that morning tore away a piece of everybody in some way. It took lives. It struck down innocence. It mauled the nation's sense of security.

For Junge, it stole away three friends.

Twenty-five-year-old Chris Mello, a high school buddy of Junge, had boarded the ill-fated American Airlines Flight 11 early that morning. The Boeing 767 and its innocent passengers, including Mello, perished at the hands of the merciless hijackers.

> "A Sept. 11 call-up, to me, was the most important thing I had ever done. Representing friends of mine who lost their lives a year prior was something indescribably humbling."
> —Eric Junge '99

Two more of Junge's friends, fellow Bucknell graduates Brad Fetchet '99 and Mark McGinley '97, went to work that morning in the World Trade Center, expecting it to be like any other day. Neither ever came back out.

The billows of ashy smoke that enveloped New York City and its once-stately skyline were too far away to reach the clean skies in Huntsville, Ala., where Junge was supposed to have pitched the first game of the Southern League Championship Series. But the heartbreak got there just fine. For the big Jacksonville Suns pitcher, the anguish kept piling on, as he heard about the fate of his pals.

The smoke over Manhattan's skyline would eventually dissipate. The hurt was forever.

On Nov. 9, 2001, the Dodgers dealt Junge to the Philadelphia Phillies as part of a package deal with reliever Jesus Cordero. The Dodgers got 29-year-old Omar Daal to provide an immediate fix for their rotation; the Phillies got the future.

Phillies general manager Ed Wade saw a tremendous upside to the lanky Bucknell grad, projecting that Junge would eventually earn a spot in the major-league club's rotation. But the Phillies were in no rush to throw their new hurler to the wolves—the majors are an unforgiving place for an inexperienced pitcher.

The still-crestfallen Junge was coming off of a 10-11 season with the AA Jacksonville Suns of the Dodgers organization. He had started 27 games, pounded out 164 innings and struck out 116 as he and the Suns soared into the league championships.

Of course, they never did play that series.

Junge was sent to Scranton/Wilkes-Barre—just a couple of hours east of his alma mater—to start the 2002 season with the AAA Red Barons. Twenty-nine starts and 180.2 innings later, he had stamped himself as the kind of pitcher that any major-league franchise would like to have waiting in the wings, providing backup artillery in the case that any major-league arms should falter or incur injury.

His 29 starts were enough to tie a Red Barons record, lead the entire Phillies system and tie for the International League lead in that category. His 126 strikeouts were fifth in the league and his 3.54 ERA was the best of the Scranton/Wilkes-Barre rotation.

Even with solid statistics, Junge didn't expect that 2002 would be his year. After the Red Barons, who won a divisional title with 91 wins, had bombed out of the first round of the International League playoffs by Sept. 6, the young ace was ready to ease into the off-season before the start of the Arizona Fall League.

It was time to rest his arm. He knew already, though, that there would be no rest for his mind in the following weeks.

The anniversary of Sept. 11 was fast approaching on the horizon, bringing with it the haunting pain that had befallen so many Americans the year before. It would drive home the finality of the tragedy.

Junge knew he'd have to brace himself for that day and all the memories that would surely accompany it. With the Red Barons' season having self-destructed, he'd at least have a little relaxation time to prepare for the harrowing anniversary.

Then he got the call.

The Philadelphia Phillies—the major-league Philadelphia Phillies—needed to give their bullpen a bit of a boost. Junge looked like a good candidate, so they extended him an official invitation on the 10th. On the 11th, he was suited for action.

Suddenly the fateful date would no longer offer the chance for Junge to sit quietly and reflect.

Instead, he'd be reflecting, mourning—and remembering—with several thousand people watching him. What it turned out to be was the opportunity of a lifetime.

"A Sept. 11 call-up, to me, was the most important thing I had ever done," Junge said. "Representing friends of mine who lost their lives a year prior was something indescribably humbling."

His tribute was subtle but poignant. On the side of his new Phillies cap he wrote the last names of the three friends he wished could be there to share the moment. For all the pride associated with living the major-league dream, the real honor of that evening was in carrying on the memory of his fallen companions.

"I'm lucky to have represented and shown the world a glimpse of who those guys were and what they stood for, even if it was just a silent inscription on my hat," Junge said. "It meant the world to me."

The fact that Fetchet, Mello and McGinley couldn't be counted in the night's attendance tally of 12, 274 didn't mean they were any less present.

Whatever careful twist of fate—or power above—that gave Junge the ball on that specific night surely also saw to it that when he threw that first pitch, there were 12,277 people watching him.

Although it was somewhat of a side note to an emotional evening, Junge fared pretty well against his first set of major-league foes. It wasn't perfect—the first batter he faced, Ramon Castro, plunked a double into deep left center—but Junge held his own. The 6-foot-5-inch rookie gave up a run, but he also struck out a batter and ended the game by inducing a 5-4-3 double play.

Three days later, he made his first major-league start. Holding Pittsburgh to four hits and one unearned run while fanning five Pirates over five innings, he also made it his first major-league win.

He pitched two more games, both in relief, before the season's end. When the Phillies called it a season, Junge's major-league statistics were pretty flashy: 12.2 innings pitched, 14 hits, three runs, two earned runs, five walks, 11 strikeouts and a superb 1.42 ERA. His record: two wins, no losses.

Maybe it's hard to judge a pitcher based on only four late-September appearances, but if Junge's 12 innings of work last fall are any indicator of what's to come, then the Philadelphia Phillies really lucked out.

His success shouldn't have come as much of a surprise to anyone who followed his ascent up the rungs of the minor-league ladder. Or just watched him pitch. He's got the brains and composure of a finesse pitcher, yet he hurls a deceptively powerful fastball.

Obviously his talent is something special. He is, after all, the only Bucknell baseball player to make the major-leagues since Bob Keegan, who retired in 1958.

He graduated with a 16-15 win-loss record and a then school-record 12 saves.

The lean right-hander has come a long way in the seven years since he first came to Bucknell.

Current Assistant Baseball Coach Rick Ciccione, a teammate of Junge's for three years, recalled how far the pitcher has come.

"Playing with Junge for three years was great because it gave me the chance to see firsthand his evolution from a laid-back free-spirit to an intense major-league prospect," Ciccione said. "His rapid ascent to the bigs is due in no small part to his dedication to improving."

When the Phillies arrived at spring training camp in Clearwater, Fla., the quest for a spot on the major-league rotation started again for Junge. With the team's depth of pitching, there wasn't any urgency for the organization to rush him in the major-leagues.

He started off the 2003 season back with Scranton/Wilkes-Barre, where he could work on location and a new curveball without the do-or-die strain of the majors.

"AAA is a theater in which to fine-tune the little things in a stress-free environment—the little things that become essential when competing at the highest level," Junge said.

He pointed out that the majors focus less on development and more on coming home with another mark in the win column.

"Of course, we learn at every level of the game—and at all points in life—but when there's little or no stress and pressure, and where mistakes are more forgiving, AAA seems to be the place," Junge said.

As it turned out, he'd be taking his learning process back up to the big-league club. After a solid pitching performance on April 3, with the Red Barons, Junge got another call from the Phillies.

The call-up, just three days into the Red Barons' season, took Junge by surprise.

"Getting called back up was unexpected at such an early point in the season," Junge said.

Junge saw another round of major-league action the day after he joined the team in Philadelphia, pitching an inning against the Pirates, giving up a run on two hits. This time around, there was less riding on the appearance.

Last Wednesday night the Phillies, who were manhandling the Braves 16-2, sent Junge in to put the nails in the coffin. He did just that, sitting down three batters in a row on fly balls—one to each outfielder.

His career ERA is now a slick 1.84 in 14.2 innings, and hopefully the Phillies will keep him around a while to let him expand on it.

For now, it can certainly be said that Bucknell's biggest baseball star in almost a half-century is really quite extraordinary.

Whatever way his luck goes over the next few months—or years—Junge will always have one memory he can look back on with the most heartfelt pride. It's not the kind of pride people derive from brilliant statistics or expertly placed pitches—although certainly he will have his share of those memories too.

It's the pride of having ensured, in his own way, that his first pitches were thrown in the presence of those he had lost a year earlier.

"Nobody can take that away from me," Junge said. "No matter if I walk away from the game tomorrow or play for 15 years."

Hogan was a real hero

It's a good thing Ben Hogan wasn't a selfish man.

If he had been, he'd never have thrown himself in front of his wife to shield her from the impact of a Greyhound bus careening towards the couple's Cadillac on a hazy February afternoon in 1949. He'd have still been sitting in the driver's seat when the impact of the bus drove his car's steering wheel through the back of the seat.

All he intended in those final moments before the crushing blow was to save his wife Valerie—his high school sweetheart—from the oncoming peril. As it happened, he saved his own life in the process.

Instead of being killed by his car's steering apparatus, he was lucky enough to wake up in the Hotel Dieu Hospital in El Paso, Texas, with a double fracture of his pelvis, a broken collarbone, a fractured ankle and a broken rib. He survived the first round of trauma to undergo emergency surgery a month later, which tied off the vena cava in his leg so the blood clots that had formed wouldn't reach his lungs and kill him.

If he had been selfish, he wouldn't have had the chance to learn how to walk again, to circle his living room again and again to build up the strength in his painful and faultily circulated legs.

The 5-foot-9-inch golfer, "Bantam" Ben, would have been six feet under when the 1950 Los Angeles Open teed off. Instead, he was there, battered body and all, to shoot a 73 in the first tournament of what would become one of the greatest comebacks in sports history.

If Hogan had thought of himself on Feb. 2, 1949, if he had just braced himself behind the wheel and hoped for the best, the golf world would have missed out on a lot.

It would have been quite a miracle for Hogan to return to his preaccident form, and no one really expected that to be the case. His former self had won the PGA Championship in 1946 and both the U.S. Open and the PGA Championship in 1948. The old Ben Hogan had won 37 tournaments in three years.

Everyone feared the old Hogan, "The Hawk," with his white cap shadowing his fierce gray eyes.

The new Hawk could barely stay on his feet long enough to finish a tournament.

Hogan, never known for his affability, just kept fighting, with his usual quiet intensity, with expectations of being as good as he was before his collision. At least as good, that is.

Sure enough, with 36 holes left in the 1950 U.S. Open, there was Hogan, painful limp and all, two strokes behind the leader. After hitting a par four on his last hole, he'd tied for first. Lloyd Mangrum and George Fazio, with four good legs between the two, couldn't outmatch Hogan's precision.

Less than a year and a half after he had nearly been compacted by a bus, he had won a major tournament.

In 1951, he added another U.S. Open—the third in his career—and a Masters. It became apparent during that year that the speculation may have been right—he wasn't the same golfer as before the accident. He was better.

He was more precise. He was more calculating, more intelligent, more accurate.

Hogan didn't come back from his horrific injuries to be the same player as he had been in the '40s. He came back a better one.

If that wasn't clear before 1953, Hogan made sure it was afterwards. That year was one of the best any golfer has ever had, regardless of the obstacles and adversity that the 41-year-old had stared down in his past.

His success in 1951 was so unexpected that it seemed improbable for his luck to keep up. 1952 hadn't been on a level with his performances the year before. As 1953 rolled around, it seemed that Hogan was slipping. After all, nobody can be that tough.

Nobody except Bantam Ben.

He won the Masters with a 274, shooting rounds of 70, 69, 66 and 69. Staring down his record-tying fourth U.S. Open, Hogan dueled with fellow legend Sam Snead before drawing away from his opponent to win by six shots. He added the British Open, which he won by four strokes.

With his victory in the British Open on a dreary day at Carnoustie, Hogan became the only man to win three majors in a calendar year. It wasn't until 2000 that another golfer—a fellow named Tiger Woods—could manage to do the same.

Hogan might have been the only man to win a Grand Slam in one year, but no story is perfect, and his legs were too weak to withstand the wear and tear of the PGA Championship.

He was keen enough to realize that ahead of time, and he never entered. He ended the year having won five of six tournaments.

Fifty years later, that season stands as one of the best in the history of the game. Maybe the best.

But that's not what he had in mind in 1949 on a road about 200 miles southeast of El Paso, when the massive bus came hurdling at his Caddy, barreling head on into the front of his vehicle. He just wanted to protect his wife, and hurling himself—all 160 pounds—between her and the monster bearing down on them was the best he could do. Luckily for her, luckily for him—luckily for golf—Hogan's selflessness made all the difference.

No sultry, "I love you."
No "I'm the luckiest man" routine.
Just the truth.

Every year, the NCAA tournament brings us some of the most thrilling games in all of sports. Listed below are the 10 most exciting games of this year's tournament. As is usually the case, the first weekend of the tournament provided the most exciting games.

No. 10: Kansas (2) vs. Utah State (15)—First Round

Utah State almost became the fifth 15 seed to win an NCAA tournament game, but came up short, 64-61. Kansas led big early in this game, but the Aggies of Utah State refused to give up. Every time Kansas tried to pull away, the Aggies came up with a clutch shot to stay in the game. They needed one more clutch shot down the stretch to prevail. Down by three, Utah State put up two three point tries to tie the game, but neither one found the net. This first round scare served as a wake-up call for Kansas, as they advanced to the national championship game.

No. 9: Missouri (6) vs. Southern Illinois (11)—First Round

Southern Illinois gave Missouri all it could handle, trying to play the role of Cinderella for the second straight year. This game was neck and neck from the opening tip to the final horn. Tied at 71 with less than 10 seconds left, Rickey Paulding of Missouri drove to the lane to try for the go-ahead basket. On the drive, Paulding was fouled by Jermaine Dearman of Southern Illinois. Paulding made one of the two ensuing free throws to give Missouri the lead. As time expired, Kent Williams of Southern Illinois missed what would have been a game-winning three, and Missouri held on 72-71.

No. 8: Kansas (2) vs. Syracuse (3)—National Championship

Syracuse came out on fire in this game, led by the hot three-point shooting of Gerry McNamara. Kansas, trailing by 11 at halftime, would not go down without a fight. Seniors Nick Collison and Kirk Hinrich led the Jayhawks on an impressive late second half run. The seniors brought Kansas from trailing 76-67 with less than four minutes left to trailing by only three with less than a minute left. With Syracuse still up three and only 12 seconds left, Warrick went to the foul line with a chance to seal the championship for the Orangemen. However, Warrick missed both shots, giving Kansas one last opportunity. Michael Lee of Kansas tried a three-pointer with two seconds left, but Warrick emphatically rejected it out of bounds, giving the Jayhawks one more shot with 1.5 seconds left. Hinrich put up a prayer at the buzzer, but the shot was way off, and Syracuse prevailed 81-78.

No. 7: Mississippi State (5) vs. Butler (12)—First Round

The Butler Bulldogs were this year's Cinderella team. Butler's improbable run to the Sweet Sixteen started with a thrilling victory over Mississippi State. With Mississippi State up by one, Brandon Miller drove to the basket and converted, giving the Bulldogs a 47-46 lead. Timmy Bowers put up one last three-point attempt for Mississippi State at the buzzer, but could not convert.

No. 6: St. Joseph's (7) vs. Auburn (10)—First Round

Jameer Nelson, who had 32 points on the day, was placed in one of the most nerve-wracking situations possible in all of sports. With his Hawks of St. Joseph's down by two with less than a second left, Nelson was on the line with two foul shots. Needing to hit them both to force overtime, Nelson converted. In overtime, the Hawks jumped out to a quick four-point lead, but could not hold on. Auburn came back and secured a 65-63 victory.

No. 5: Notre Dame (5) vs. Wisconsin-Milwaukee (12)—First Round

Dylan Page of Wisconsin-Milwaukee probably has the worst memory of this year's NCAA tournament than any other player involved. With Notre Dame leading 70-69, Wisconsin-Milwaukee had the ball and opted to hold for the last shot. Clay Tucker drove the lane as time ran down and dished the ball to Page when he ran into a herd of Notre Dame players. Page was wide open for the game-winning lay up, but could not convert, allowing the Fighting Irish to advance.

No. 4: California (8) vs. North Carolina St. (9)—First Round

This tightly contested game featured one of the greatest flurries of action in NCAA history. With California up 73-71 with less than 15 seconds left in overtime, Scooter Sherrill hit a three-pointer for NC State to give them a 74-73 lead. Then, wasting no time, Cal took off down the court and Richard Midgley nailed a three-pointer with 3.9 seconds left. Sherrill sprinted down the court and put up one last shot, but could not convert and Cal advanced with a 76-74 victory.

No. 3: Maryland (6) vs. UNC-Wilmington (11)—First Round

This first round match-up brought us the single greatest shot of this year's tournament. The defending national champions were trailing 73-72 following two clutch foul shots by Aaron Coombs of UNC-Wilmington. Maryland put the ball in the hands of Drew Nicholas to keep its hopes of defending its title alive. As time expired, Nicholas threw up an off-balance shot from the right corner. Miraculously, the shot found nothing but net and Maryland lived another day with an exhilarating 75-73 victory.

No. 2: Wisconsin (5) vs. Tulsa (13)—Second Round

Upset-minded Tulsa came up one basket short of advancing to the Sweet Sixteen. Tulsa led 58-45 with just 4 minutes 8 seconds to play. Wisconsin, refusing to give up, stormed back and cut Tulsa's lead to two with 48 seconds left. Then, after a shot clock violation on Tulsa, Wisconsin could hold for the last shot. Freddie Owens was given the ball for Wisconsin to try to avoid the upset. With one tick left on the clock, Owens buried a three-pointer, capping an amazing comeback by the Wisconsin Badgers.

No. 1: Arizona (1) vs. Gonzaga (9)—Second Round

No game in this year's tournament was anywhere close to th excitement that was felt during the second round match-up between perennial Cinderella, Gonzaga, and perennial favorite, Arizona. With Arizona up 78-76 near the end of regulation, Blake Stepp of Gonzaga missed an attempt at a go-ahead three-pointer. The rebound fell right into the hands of teammate Tony Skinner, who hit a game-tying shot as time expired. In the first overtime, with the score tied at 89, Stepp had another chance at a game-winning shot at the buzzer, but could not get the shot to fall. In double overtime, with Arizona up 96-95, Skinner missed a three pointer with four seconds left. Again, Gonzaga got a fortuitous rebound, as Skinner's miss landed right in Stepp's hands, five feet from the basket. Stepp put up the game-deciding shot, but it did not fall, and Arizona prevailed 96-95. Many Gonzaga players collapsed to the floor showing their devastation, although they certainly could not be ashamed of their performance.

the second quarter before they scored five straight and eight of the next nine to take a commanding 11-3 lead.

"Our midfield is all seniors so they know how to get it done," Jamieson said. "They have significantly helped us this year."

Next up for the Bison is a critical game against Army. The Bison, who were picked to win the League with Hobart this year, have already gotten by Hobart, and now have the next biggest test of the year as Army was picked not far behind and tied the Bison and Hobart for the League Championship last year.

"Army is always good even if they don't have skill level that their opponents do," Sussman said. "They always fight as hard as they can and they're in great shape, so it's going to be a tough one."

Before this year's seniors came to the program the Bison were 1-16 in the last 17 matchups against Army, but these seniors have yet to lose to them. This game has even more implications for the seniors who can become the University's all-time most winning class with a win this weekend.

"We're not going to do a lot of mysterious stuff against Army, we're just going to make a few adjustments. Our team knows how huge this game is and we match up great," Jamieson said.

The Bison are treating this game like a play-in game to the NCAA Tournament, but in reality the team could still gain a berth with a loss. Even so, that isn't something going through the minds of the players who are out to win every game.

"With the senior leadership that we have we're going into every game hungry," Sussman said. "It's important that we go in there with a chip on our shoulders because we still have something to prove."

Bison reach 3-2 in P.L. with Holy Cross split

By Michelle Martin
Feature Layout Editor

The softball team dropped to 3-18 on the season as they lost 4-6 to Holy Cross on March 30 before rain washed out the second game of their scheduled doubleheader. Strong hitting, especially from Meredith Gill '03, propelled the Bison to a 3-0 lead after the top of the fourth inning. The Crusaders came back within one in the bottom of the fourth, before tacking on three more runs in the fifth to take a lead they never relinquished. Gill hit four-for-four in the contest, and the Bison enjoyed doubles from both Gill and Lauren Wible '06, as well as four stolen bases. The defense could not stop the barrage of Holy Cross runs late in the game. Julie Williams '06 went the distance, pitching a complete game while giving up 10 hits.

The Bison won 2-0 over the Crusaders in the nightcap of Saturday's doubleheader to win their first Patriot League game. The game remained scoreless until the top of the sixth inning, when Angela Stackhouse '04 struck for a single and was scored on a sacrifice fly by Kris Devore '06. The Orange and Blue struck for an insurance run in the top of the seventh on a Stackhouse double that brought in Kristen Potts '04, who reached base on a single. The defense stepped up in the game to keep the Crusaders from ruining the Bison lead. Hurler Kelli Haskins '05 pitched seven shutout innings while only giving up five hits and one walk.

Earlier in the day, Bucknell dropped a 2-1 decision. Gill smashed the first home run of the season for the Bison in her first at-bat, giving the team a 1-0 lead. Holy Cross knotted the game at one in the bottom of the fifth inning and tacked on one more in the sixth. The Bison could not get a break from the Crusader defense and were held scoreless the rest of the game.

On March 27, the Orange and Blue dropped a doubleheader to St. Francis (Pa.). In the nightcap of the series, Bucknell struck for one run in the first inning when Wible hit a two-out double down the left field line to score Gill, who had reached on an error and was sacrificed to second base. The score stayed 1-0 until the top of the fourth, when the Red Flash tied it up and went on to score two more runs in the seventh. The Bison started a mini rally, as Alyssa Schneebaum '06 and Jenny Ross '05 hit singles to start off the inning. St. Francis forced Bucknell into two fielder's choices before a strikeout ended the game.

The Bison lost 6-1 earlier in the day after an early scoring deficit. St. Francis jumped out to a 3-0 lead after two innings of play, and held Bucknell to no hits until the sixth inning. In the sixth, Schneebaum hit a leadoff single to center field, but could not score as a result of a double play. The Bison finally got on the board in the bottom of the seventh, but it was too late. Stackhouse led off the seventh with a single and Gill scored her on a two-out double. Runners were on first and third before the Red Flash got the last Bison hitter to strike out swinging.

Tennis sweeps St. Mary's

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bison women's tennis team dropped a 4-2 decision to Colgate but got back on track beating Towson 7-0. Earlier in the week the team swept Mount St. Mary's 7-0. The men's team got on the winning track after dropping matches to American 6-0 and Navy 7-0, beating Mount St. Mary's 6-1 and Towson 7-0.

Against Colgate, Nadezda Curcic '05 and Veronica Brown '06 got things started with a win at number one doubles 8-4. Tanya Sichko '05 and Rheanna Gaskin '04 followed with a 9-8 (5) win over at the second flight to secure the doubles point for the Bison.

Brown was the sole winner for the Bison in singles play winning 6-2, 6-1, which was not enough to capture the win.

"Colgate is always one of the strongest teams in doubles, so I was surprised we won that," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "Maybe we went into singles play overly excited and Colgate was ready to play and they won, which was disappointing."

The women got back on focus, sweeping Towson and losing only one set in the process.

"We played just about flawless tennis," Helt said. "We stayed motivated and strong in the head and didn't let the Colgate loss bring us down, which was really good to see."

Earlier in the week the women's team didn't lose a set en route to a 7-0 drubbing of Mount St. Mary's.

Being a young team, the men's team has struggled all year, having to play a lot of players at levels at which they normally wouldn't compete. After being swept earlier in the week by both Navy and American their record was a dismal 1-13. The team finally responded this week, picking up wins against Mount St. Mary's and Towson.

"It felt good to pick up those wins. I think they'll give us a confidence booster for us the rest of the season," said Nick Denefrio '05 who teamed up with Gerald DiChiara '05 in doubles play in both of the Bison wins.

Denefrio also won both of his singles matches in the wins at the No. 1 spot.

"Our team knew coming into this season that 95 percent of their losses would be against teams that they were not strong enough to beat, so that they would be challenged to be a whole new team next year," Denefrio said.

The Bison still have a few league matches that they are focusing on winning before this year is over. Helt would like to see the Bison beat Lehigh, a team she thinks they have a shot at competing with.

The men are slated to host Army at noon tomorrow, while the women's match this Tuesday against UMBC was postponed. Their next match is at 3 p.m. Thursday at Villanova.

In the last 5 minutes and 36 seconds, Dusquesne managed to score five goals. Paraud snuck in her second goal of the day with 3:25 left to move the Bison's total to 10, but it was not enough to thwart the Dukes' momentous rally.

In the last 3:10 of the game, Bucknell saw its 10-8 lead vanish as Dusquesne fired off three straight scores, the last with 41 seconds left on the clock.

Both teams had 25 shots in the game, and the Bison actually got off more shots (13) in the second half than they had in their high-scoring first half (12).

The team will try to restart its winning streak at Colgate on tomorrow. The Bison hope to improve their Patriot League record, which stands at 2-2, when they square off at noon against Colgate.

Bison defense performs well

Phil has been doing a great job all year."

The Bison gave the ball to Futrick to close out the win. Futrick allowed one run, but snuffed out the Midshipmen's effort when he struck out the final two batters.

The Bison squared off with Navy for another doubleheader on April 6, losing a one-run contest and then coming back for a victory in the series finale.

Both teams were quiet against dominating pitching efforts throughout the first game on Sunday, as the two teams combined for just four hits. The Bison's lone run came in the sixth inning when Hirschberg blasted a solo home run to center field for his fifth round-tripper of the season.

Bucknell's defensive precision slipped a bit in the game, as the Bison committed three errors that led to two unearned runs. Despite taking the loss, co-captain Zach Allen '06 pitched a gem, giving up just one hit, two bases on balls and no earned runs in his six innings of work.

Allen delivered one of many superb performances that contributed to the team effort. He was impressed by his team's ability to put everything together all weekend.

"We knew going into the series that it was going to be a battle throughout, but we came together to play one of the best series that I have ever been a part of," Allen said. "Our pitching staff was great and our hitting was very timely."

The second game of the day saw the Bison shut out Navy to seal their third win of the series. The team's pitching was once again a crucial factor in the victory, as Kevin Burns '03 and Futrick combined to shut out the Midshipmen 2-0.

Burns went six innings, allowing six hits and striking out three while holding Navy scoreless en route to earning his third win of the season. Futrick pitched a hitless seventh inning to earn his sixth save of the season.

Burns was enthusiastic about the message that the team's series sent to future competitors.

"This past weekend against Navy showed the rest of the league that we can be a force that cannot be taken lightly," Burns said. "We also had some timely hitting and solid defense, which contributed to our overall success."

The Bison offense scored all the runs they needed in the second and third innings.

In the second inning, Ben Krentzman '03 reached first on a third-strike wild pitch and then scored when Walter knocked a single to left field.

Stoll led off the third with a single, stole second and then advanced to third base on a sacrifice ground out by Moss. A Day single scored Stoll and gave the Bison a 2-0 lead, which remained for the rest of the game.

The game was an excellent finish to a memorable series for Bison pitching. Ciccione was impressed by the performance.

"Our pitching staff asserted itself as being the best in the Patriot League by overwhelming the defending league champions for four straight games," Ciccione said. "This was the most dominating performance I have seen in my six years in the league. It began with Kevin Miller's first pitch of the first game and lasted until Futrick struck out the final hitter."

Ciccione hopes the Bison get a chance to utilize the depth of the bullpen in future games, as well, since only Futrick got a chance to work out of the pen against Navy.

"We have 13 great pitchers, but we only were able to use five this weekend," Ciccione said. "There are some tremendous arms not getting the innings they deserve."

The five Bison pitchers used over the weekend combined to pitch 29 innings, allowing only three earned runs and striking out 24. Depew was thrilled with the numbers put up by the staff.

"The Navy series was highlighted by some of the best pitching we have ever gotten in a league series," Depew said. "We gave up only 18 hits for a .173 Bating average and struck out 24 while walking seven. Our pitching staff performed and competed at the highest level."

Depew also mentioned the importance of the team's outstanding defense and efficient offense.

"We played very solid defense except for the first game on Sunday," Depew said. "We executed well on the base path with some crucial stolen bases and put runners in scoring position with successful sacrifice bunts."

The weekend increased the Bison's league record to 6-2, while it improved their overall record to 14-7. After only 21 games, the Bison have already equalled the number of league wins they had during the entire 2002 season.

Ciccione knows the team will need to stay on track over the remainder of the season.

"We need to stay focused for the remaining 12 games to assure ourselves of the post-season," Ciccione said. "But with the mental makeup of this team, I don't think they plan on letting up."

The team hopes to continue its winning trend when it faces off against Patriot League foe Lehigh on Saturday and Sunday. The series consists of two doubleheaders at Lehigh, both starting at noon.

Grant expects an intense series.

"We're looking forward to taking care of some unfinished business at Lehigh this weekend," Grant said. "They beat us badly last year and decided to celebrate on our home field. We have all the motivation we need to go in there and get the job done."

Ciccione agrees on the need for revenge.

"Lehigh took it to us last year and showed us up on our home field," Ciccione said. "It's time for redemption."

The art of Andersson

Associate Professor and Chair of the Art Department Christianne Andersson takes on a full plate with extensive responsibilities in America and Europe. After teaching at colleges and universities in the United States and abroad, as well as working at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Andersson has now been at Bucknell University for the past five years.

LEAH CUNNINGHAM
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Born in Germany, Christianne Andersson came to America at age 3 and spent her years in America and Europe, where she has taught at prestigious institutions and traveled for fellowships, exhibitions and guest lectures. Now a professor of art and art history and chair of the art department at Bucknell, Andersson continues her dedication and enthusiasm for the arts.

Immersed in both travel and the arts for as long as she can remember, Andersson first came to America when her father took a job as conductor of the New Orleans Opera. Andersson even sang in the children's opera chorus.

"It was very exciting for my father to be conductor of the New Orleans Opera, because, of course, I loved music, and it was a lot of fun," Andersson said. "I sang in all of the children's roles in operas while in New Orleans including 'La Boheme' and 'Carmen.' There were sections when just the children would sing on stage, and as I got older, I was able to sing with the regular chorus."

Andersson credits her parents as her role models. She said her mother's full-time working responsibilities as head of the music library at Tulane University was an important example for her.

Andersson grew up with an older and a younger brother, and spoke French and German at home.

"It was a different experience to grow up in a house where two different languages are spoken. My parents spoke German and I went to a private school where I learned French," Andersson said.

Receiving her Bachelor of Arts degree in art history as an undergraduate at Tulane, Andersson was able to spend her junior and senior years abroad in Paris. She continued her education by completing three years of graduate work at Stanford University, where she received her Ph.D. in art history, and then wrote her dissertation in Basel, Switzerland. While a graduate at Stanford, Andersson had a Swiss dissertation adviser, Professor Forster, who helped find and encourage a Swiss topic. Forster later became Director of the Getty Research Institute in Los Angeles.

Still in Switzerland, Andersson's first job was teaching art history at Columbia University, where she worked with undergraduate and graduate students for nine years.

"It must have been sheer talent or something," Andersson said about landing the job. "I gave a lecture at a professional conference and a lot of people talked about that lecture and it attracted a lot of attention. I was looking for a position, and at that point, I still lived in Switzerland."

Not staying put in one place for too long, Andersson then took up a job as curator of old master paintings at the Staedel Museum in Frankfurt, Germany, from 1986-1995.

"I thought I would enjoy working very directly with works of art, and the museum wanted me to write and research the scholarly catalog of a group of paintings. In a way, it was like a research job. It was staking out new terrain, finding out things people didn't know yet," Andersson said.

Andersson said that one of the downfalls of that job was the fact that the museum did not have the funding for the kind of work they were asking her to do. By applying for grants, the museum finally received the J. Paul Getty Grant, but Andersson was ready to come back to the United States.

"If you really devote yourself with something that you are completely fascinated with, you will wind up having a very intense, but very fulfilled life. You work like a dog—but you love it!"

—Christianne Andersson, associate professor of art

The extensive traveling and moving from country to country did not wear out Andersson. She was always looking for new projects and challenges.

"I grew up with two languages and visiting relatives in Germany as a child, so I've always grown up on two continents. It's not much of a transition. I felt at home wherever I was because I was used to traveling so much," Andersson said.

When Andersson returned to the United States, she became the Robert Sterling Clark Professor at Williams College Graduate Program in art history in Williamstown, Mass., for one year, where she specialized in Northern Renaissance art. After this year, Andersson reached the peak of her career with a fellowship at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in 1996 where she lived in a high-rise apartment right on Bleaker Street.

"The fellowship enabled me to work on a project on the prints and drawings of an artist, Barthel Beham. Imagine having an office in the Met and going every day and talking to incredibly smart, well-educated people. Working on the inside as opposed to just visiting ... it's a whole other story," Andersson said.

In January of 1997, Andersson's travels brought her to Bucknell University as the Samuel H. Kress Professor of Art History. She teaches Renaissance and Baroque art, Museum Studies, all aspects of the history of prints and drawings, a foundation seminar on Portraits, and a capstone called "Renaissance Women," among other courses.

"What I like most [about teaching at Bucknell] is the really intense contact between students and professors, and the opportunities that I have to work with students, like different projects," Andersson said.

Faculty admire her work and passion for teaching.

"I so admire the way Professor Andersson has her students curate art exhibits with existing art works from either Bucknell's art collection or borrowed from other collections. In their hands-on process of creating art exhibits for the Bucknell community, her students become articulate in their understanding and appreciation of artists and their creative works," Associate Professor of Theatre Bob Gainer said.

Students in Andersson's print seminar recently opened an exhibition in the Samek Art Gallery where students studied the art gallery's collections of prints and chose prints they were really interested in to research.

"Professor Andersson frequently engages her students with the Samek Art Gallery. Her students regularly study the Kress Study Collection, temporary exhibitions and visiting artists and scholars. Last fall, she taught a Prints and Popular Culture course. She and students spent many hours researching some of the gallery's many prints. This led to the exhibition 'Exquisite Images: Historic and Contemporary Prints from the Permanent Collection,'" Director of the Samek Art Gallery Dan Mills said. "This is something I am especially pleased with. If you think the gallery is a lab and the collection as a research field, the print exhibition could be a model for future student research projects."

Students appreciated the innovative print exhibition project as well.

"Each student was to take a couple of the prints and research [them] for the rest of the semester, and Professor Andersson was very helpful because she went to the Met to find out information on the art, and helped with our research," Andrew Rheingrover '04 said.

Andersson's colleagues and students are impressed with not only her work, but also her dedication, depth of understanding and support for the arts.

"Christianne has a finely chiseled intellectual appreciation of art and literature, but more importantly, she embodies her intuitive grasp of light, form and meaning in a deeply passionate fashion. Of course, to me this vitality is central to our sensibilities, literally," friend and Associate Professor of Biology Kathleen Page said. "Christianne and I have pondered the possibility that the way we perceive the subtleties of our daily experience ultimately translates into an expression of our life force. Being threads itself through these sensory experiences and no one weave is shared by another. This conversation fascinates us and we continue to meet it, often along that fracture line between the analytic and the sensual."

Aside from her many accomplishments—from serving on the Board of Advisers for the Center for Advanced Study in the Visual Arts at the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., to being the Art History Discipline Representative to the Renaissance Society of America and just returning from their annual conference in Toronto and her countless teaching efforts and responsibilities—Andersson still manages to give lectures around the country.

"I've learned what I can do and know what I can manage in so much time," Andersson said about her frequent lectures. "The more you have learned and read and taught, you have this huge background of knowledge to fall back on. You build up on that all the time."

With her travel, lectures and experiences in researching, teaching and passion for all areas of the arts, Andersson continues to lead an enriching life grounded in ambition.

"If you really devote yourself with something that you are completely fascinated with, you will wind up having a very intense, but very fulfilled life," Andersson said. "You work like a dog—but you love it!"

❖ MUSIC PREVIEW

Over the past few years, the hard-rock/heavy-metal industry has continued to produce new, talented artists that have become big names in the music world.

With its debut album "The Routine" to be released by RCA, which produced many of the top artists—incubus, Linkin Park and Hoobastank—May 6, Hotwire has the hard-hitting capabilities to make a large impact on rock music and its loyal followers.

As one of the newest rock projects hailing from the greater part of Los Angeles, Hotwire uses melodic, harmonious lyrics fused with a steady beat and heavy, edgy guitar riffs to capture fans and listeners.

The band—Rus Martin (vocals/guitar), Gabe Garcia (guitar), Brain Borg (drums), and Chris Strauser (bass)—formed in 1999 in Thousand Oaks, Calif., and soon began composing and writing. In late 2000, Hotwire signed with RCA and recorded a self-titled four-song extended play record (EP) that summer. With the EP finding a wide rock audience, Hotwire went on the road to tour for seven months with groups including Dillinger Escape Plan, Hoobastank, Poison The Well, Wu-Tang Clan and Injected.

In October 2002, Hotwire began planning to record its full-length debut, using Matt Hyde to produce at Los Angeles' legendary Sound City. With the hard-metal sounds in songs like "Invisible" and "Neuro Girl" to the distorted neo-punk sounds of "Tweaked," Hotwire's members combine mixture of contained and unleashed to express the alienation, desperation and hypocrisy of their suburban upbringings. The album features 12 hardcore, intense and hostile tracks of metal fused with punk influences.

Hotwire confirmed that it will play for this summer's eighth annual Ozzfest. The band will be performing on the second stage with Cradle of Filth, Trust Company, Shadows Fall, Killswitch Engage, Finger Eleven, Grade 8, Twisted Method, Unloco and Memento throughout the tour, which starts in San Antonio, Texas, and concludes in West Palm Beach, Fla. The main stage will feature Korn, Marilyn Manson, Disturbed, Ozzy and Chevelle. Hotwire will also be joining Nothingface on tour before the two groups play at the Ozzfest 2003 festivities.

Ticheli strikes up the band

❖ CONCERT REVIEW

The University Symphonic Band presented the music and style of renowned composer and guest conductor Frank Ticheli in its concert Friday night in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

The night's program included Frank Ticheli compositions "Postcard," "Simple Gifts: Four Shaker Songs," "Loch Lomond" and "Blue Shades."

"I enjoy whatever I'm doing at the time. Every piece is different in what you can experience, we can go to places that words alone can't take us to," Ticheli said about his composing style.

This is reflected in the quality of his work, as well as the inspiration behind it.

The first quick and harmonically interesting piece, "Postcard," played with irregular musical rhythms and a unique sharpness of timbre and harmony. According to Ticheli, its vivaciousness reflects the life of his friend's mother, for whom the piece was composed.

"'Postcard' was commissioned by my dear and personal friend H. Robert Reynolds at the University of Michigan," Ticheli said at the concert. "He called me the day after his mother died and asked me to write a piece. He didn't want an elegy though, he wanted a celebration of her life. He described his mother as short and energetic, so that's how I wrote the piece."

This brief vivacity was not the only characteristic absorbed by the piece from the life of this woman.

"The Reynolds family had a habit of having palindromic names, so the whole piece is based on a palindrome," Ticheli said. "Harrah is the 'H' in H. Robert Reynold's, so I put this in the middle of the piece. I also put in his mother's name, Ethel."

The influences used for the next set of works on the program were from a different source, but still obvious and profound. "Simple Gifts: Four Shaker Songs" is a set of old American pieces arranged for band. Since this was an arrangement, Ticheli strove to stay true to their original style and form.

"I loved the simplicity of the original melodies, so I stayed really direct in my music, and never pretentious," Ticheli said.

The simplicity reflected in the clean, lyrical sound experimented with different instruments playing simple and familiar tunes.

"Loch Lomond," the third Ticheli piece performed, was also an arrangement and held true to its original style with its slow, long phrasing and rich, deep cover of sound. In an interesting cultural and musical twist, Ticheli juxtaposed this traditional Scottish tune with the most famous of Irish tunes, "Danny Boy," to end his arrangement.

Ticheli's "Blue Shades" ended the program with its jazz-inspired sound. This piece was originally commissioned by over 30 bands, each with their own capacity of experience and ability. According to Ticheli, "Blue Shades" is a compromise of these abilities.

"I decided to write a piece that would leave the less experienced players in the dust, but would let them have fun trying," Ticheli said.

In the band's performance of this fun and challenging piece, Dan Sitomer '03 gave a talented performance of Ticheli's bluesy clarinet solo.

Also on the evening's program were the Spanish sounding "El Camino Real" and the marching-band-like "Gallop," both composed by Alfred Reed. Morton Gould's "Yankee Doodle" rendered the familiar tune comically.

Ticheli sincerely enjoyed his time as guest conductor.

"I've really enjoyed the faculty members here and their positive attitude. It is wonderful to be around people who have such a genuine love of music," Ticheli said.

Those in the audience genuinely loved Ticheli's music.

"I really enjoyed Ticheli's pieces—especially his use of scoring and color," Katie Pulumbo '04 said.

Ticheli also liked his experience with the students involved in the symphonic band. "These past rehearsals we've had to do a lot of work, so it's been in that setting, but we've had a lot of fun too," Ticheli said.

Ticheli seemed able to look over the work involved in this technique.

"I'm in the business of making beautiful things," Ticheli said. "Technique is not the ends, but the means."

After Friday night's concert, Ticheli plans to travel through England and Florida doing guest engagements there as well. As a conductor and composer, he was able to make his love of music something nearly tangible for the audience.

A slammin' Saturday at the 7th St. Café

Coffee and poetry—to some a snoozer, to others the preferred Saturday night activity. While some people may be getting slammed, a select group of poets is getting their slam on. At 8 p.m., the University's slam master, Aaron DeRosa '03, will host the fourth and final installment of the slam poetry series at 7th Street Café. Featuring the 1999 National Individual Slam Champion Roger Bonair-Agard, the slam will also include an open mic portion and student competitions.

Bonair-Agard has a laundry list of accomplishments and boasts appearances on the HBO series "Russell Simmons Presents Def Poetry," the "MacNeile/Lehrer NewsHour" and CBS' "60 Minutes." A native of Trinidad and Tobago, Bonair-Agard travels throughout the country teaching workshops, giving lectures and reading for the louderARTS project which he co-founded—otherwise, he calls Brooklyn home.

Christina Macmillan '05 has assisted DeRosa in the planning of the series.

"The professional poets definitely help to make the slams as entertaining as they are, but I want to stress the fact that it is the student and faculty participation that really makes them special. Without [the students'] enthusiasm and support, there would be nothing," Macmillan said.

The student competition remains a favorite with the student body.

"I am so psyched for this weekend's poetry slam," Charissa Reimer '05 said. "I thoroughly enjoyed the talent that came out in the last one I attended, and I'm excited to see what the slammers come up with this time."

The attraction stems from the art form's accessibility.

"I find poetry slams to be an addiction—once you go to one, you can't stop. Slams are so accessible that you can find them anywhere in the country, and it has truly made me so happy to see them here at Bucknell," Macmillan said.

Wannabe slammers can still sign up for the open mic portion at the door. Sign ups will begin at 7:45 p.m.

The competition will comprise of individuals or teams in a three round competition. Prizes will be awarded and the name of the winner enshrined on the Slam Hammer, a slam tradition. The Slam is supported by the slam Committee, Activities and Campus Events, FLAGBT and the Association for the Arts.

"We joke about living in the 'bubble' but it's true in a lot of ways. To having something so edgy and contemporary here at BU is amazing, and the fact that the entire campus is supportive of the events is even more wonderful to me," Macmillan said.

Who can find a good woman?

BY KRISTI JOHNSTON
Senior Writer

After more than a year of planning, the University Theatre and Dance Department will present the Bertolt Brecht classic "The Good Woman of Setzuan," featuring a cast of 27 and an original score, at 8 p.m. April 11–14 in the Harvey Powers Theatre.

"The Good Woman of Setzuan" presents the story of a woman torn between her desire to be honorable and the realities of life.

"Three gods come down from heaven in search of a truly good person and discover Shen Te the prostitute is the only one worthy of being called virtuous," Associate Professor of Theater Robert Gainer said. The gods decide to reward her selflessness.

"They reward her with gold, which she uses to buy a tobacco shop. Immediately she becomes a victim of parasites, because in her goodness she cannot refuse help to the less fortunate. In order to survive, she impersonates an imaginary, ruthless male cousin," Gainer said.

This begins a struggle between the two sides of human nature. The play raises the question of how to remain virtuous when the world requires a degree of ruthlessness to survive.

Brecht wrote the play in 1941, a time marked by conflict and fear. The issues raised within the play, especially poignant for Brecht during this period, are still resonate today.

"The world makes it hard to be good," Gainer said. "The question is as relevant today as it ever was. This is a universal human predicament."

The production will feature an original score by Ashi Day '04. Day's compositions include songs for performance by the cast and incidental music. She also serves as an assistant stage manager.

"I read through the script first," Day said of her creative process. "Then whatever came to me I put into music. I tried to find what was appropriate for the characters."

Day praised the actors and crew for their ability to bring her music to life.

"The most difficult part was putting everything together—figuring out the logistics," Day said.

Gainer looks forward to the intertwining of the story and Day's music. He believes that the score will support Brecht's purpose for the play. He also notes that the production will feature the use of multimedia equipment.

"Brecht wanted the audience to be enchanted by the play, but he also wanted to make them think," Gainer said.

Tickets for the play are $6 and can be purchased at the Campus Box Office, the Weis Center Box Office or at the door.

Flashback to shadows for Silhouettes

Mariah Carey, Billy Joel and U2 will find themselves sharing a stage while the a cappella vocal stylings of the Silhouettes perform in an annual concert. In efforts to promote their new realease "Shadows of Our Former Selves," the Silhouettes, the University's all female a cappella group, will sing in Rooke Chapel tonight.

The group enjoys singing together and is especially excited about the debut of its new album. Rachel Tooley '06, a new member of the Silhouettes, encourages students to come hear new songs.

"The group we have now is so talented and we all have similar goals in what we want to put out there," Tooley said. "I love singing with them because it's completely different from any other singing opportunities on campus, and we all have so much fun."

Besides having fun, the Silhouettes have focused on increasing their musical quality as well.

"Everyone in the group is incredibly talented, and brings so much to our organization. Some of us are in the music department, while others have all different majors, but we all love to sing and to perform!" Silhouettes member Kim Hallman '04 said.

Slated to be a fun concert, Hallman explained the draw for the concert.

"Our CD turned out spectacularly, and we can't wait to release it. Also, we have some alumni coming back for the concert, and a great guest group who will be performing," Hallman said. "We've put a lot of effort into our songs, and into the planning of the concert, and we're just so excited to perform new material, especially in a space as acoustically-fantastic as the chapel!"

Tooley echoed her sentiments.

"We've been working really hard to put together a great show. We have a bunch of new songs to debut as well as some skits and CD giveaways for in between. We are also excited to have a guest group from James Madison University join us," Tooley said.

Tickets are $5 and are on sale all week in the LC (cash or BU ID) and at the door. Copies of the new CD, "Shadows of Our Former Selves" can be purchased tonight for $15.

Costner creates commotion

Famous Hollywood actor Kevin Costner and his daughter Annie are spotted while touring the University campus. Costner willingly stopped to sign autographs, talk with students and faculty and even posed for pictures. Some students brought out videotapes to document Costner's guest appearance.

❖ GOSSIP COLUMN

Shrieks echoed in Bostwick Cafeteria as Kevin Costner's hunky body, topped with a comb-over, sauntered through on a tour of our humble university. His daughter, a prospective student touring the University, accompanied him on his walk.

Female students and middle-aged female staffers followed him as though he were the Pied Piper or leather pants on sale for $20. In a desperate attempt to give their lives meaning, they thrust pens, papers and body parts to be signed in front of the actor as they strove to walk on his field of dreams. Some people were willing to dance with wolves just to catch a glimpse.

Black turtleneck and sunglasses could not hide his identity as word spread throughout the campus of his presence in a little over five minutes. Public Safety officers escorted the celebrity as they tried to restrain the growing posse.

Digital pictures soon flew from inbox to inbox—all capturing the recognizable profile. These mementos left women wishing their name was Maid Marion and that he was wearing green tights.

Let's just hope the University hit a hole in one as it courted that tin cup.

Farrell's "Phone Booth" a hang-up

BY DAVID MERIN
Writer

❖ MOVIE REVIEW

Colin Farrell's new movie "Phone Booth," a sniper thriller originally set to be released last fall, was only recently released after the Washington, D.C., sniper crisis found closure. After watching the movie, I argue that real-life snipers are sadly enough much more interesting and terrifying.

The story begins in the busy, cell-phone clogged, streets of New York with a glimpse into the life of Stu Shepard (Farrell), a superficial, self-absorbed, small-time media consultant.

The plots starts to pique interest when Shepard takes off his wedding ring and steps into a phone booth to call a pretty young girl who just moved to the city from Montana. After Shepard unsuccessfully tries to set up a meeting time at a nearby hotel, the phone rings.

Shepard picks up the phone. He is soon informed that the man on the other end of the telephone is a sniper with his sights set on Shepard. If Shepard hangs up or doesn't do as the sniper wants, he will be shot. The sniper demonstrates his power and then, after a series of interesting run-ins with the local prostitutes, the cops arrive on the scene, creating a media frenzy.

From this point on you just count the minutes until the movie ends. Director Joel Schumacher fails to create the tension and fear necessary to sustain an edge-of-your-seat real-time thriller like this movie was supposed to be. Believe me, there are better things to spend your $7 on than this movie revolving around a telephone booth.

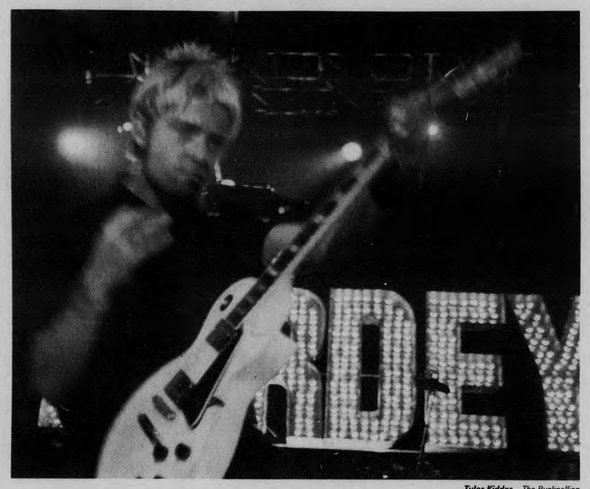
G-Love & Special Sauce gives Third Eye Blind a good taste

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

❖ Concert Review

The University community's diverse taste in music is rarely satisfied with campus concerts. Some acts hit unexpectedly, whereas some tend to miss the mark of their anticipated popularity. This past weekend, as the Sojka Pavilion opened its doors to music for the first time, Third Eye Blind, along with support act G. Love & Special Sauce, seemed to fall somewhere in the middle—at least with regard to attendance. While the arena was only about half full, each act did its best to rouse the crowd. Where Third Eye Blind's flashy lights and exaggerated stage show fell short, G. Love & Special Sauce took a more classic, simpler route, and did so with notable success.

The Philadelphia-based three-piece has not held the spotlight like Third Eye Blind and with the exception of one song used in a Coors Light commercial, few people outside of the underground music scene would recognize G. Love's music. Its fan base has grown thanks to play on college radio, stellar live performances and word of mouth. In addition, G. Love has the ability to draw in a large range of fans, thanks to its eclectic mix of jamming, rock, folk, blues, hip-hop and funk. While the band was crammed in the only space where Third Eye Blind didn't have equipment, G. Love made the best possible use of its time. Over the 60-minute set, the band controlled the crowd. The sheer energy with which the lead singer performed the band's lesser-known songs was more than enough to captivate the audience. They really got rolling during "I-76," named for the Philadelphia highway, and finished strongly with "Cold Beverage" and "Unity," a song about racial peace.



Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Johnny Rzezn, lead guitarist for Third Eye Blind, takes the spotlight after concert opener, G-Love & Special Sauce wins the audience. The new Sojka Pavilion opened last Friday to invite the 2003 spring concert performers.

Surprisingly, before Third Eye Blind took the stage, many fans had actually left, as their attendance was based on G. Love's inclusion in the lineup. Once the lights went down, the arena was replenished with latecomers, and Third Eye Blind opened its set with "Blinded," the first single from its upcoming album. It was this trend that seemed to kill the crowd right from the start. The band tried to appease its old fans by playing past hits like "Jumper," "Motorcycle Driveby," "How's It Gonna Be" and "Semi-Charmed Life." But with a good number of songs from the new release, which no one has heard yet, people seemed to feel slighted knowing specific hits they could have heard were ignored and replaced with new songs in an attempt to promote an album.

The night proved fairly successful overall, and G. Love & Special Sauce backed up the notion that extravagant lights and a big stage show means nothing if a band can just get on stage and rock.

Local group brings theater to community

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

The dramatic arts are alive and well in the Lewisburg area, thanks in part to the Gaspipe Theater Group. This theater ensemble, founded in January 2000, has put on over 25 productions and doesn't plan to stop anytime soon.

Gaspipe travels to local high schools performing motivational and educational plays, focusing on issues such as drug use and date rape. In addition, it produces original plays, poetry readings and classic theater.

"Gaspipe was created in January 2000 when I had a degree in theater but got a job as a planner, and I met Derek Scott, who has written many plays, but works at the Lewisburg Penitentiary," said Danielle McCormick, the group's director. "Both of us were trying to find a way to nurture our artistic sides, while also finding a way to address societal issues."

Ben Hartman '05 has been a member of the group for about a year. He heard about it from a friend, and has performed in many plays, including last summer's production of Shakespeare's "Othello."

"It was a lot of fun," Hartman said of his experience. "I had a hard time with the lines, but we had a great time."

"Both of us were trying to find a way to nurture our artistic sides, while also finding a way to address societal issues."

—Danielle McCormick, director of Gaspipe Theater Group

"Othello" was part of the Gaspipe's annual Shakespeare in the Park event. The event has also featured the group's presentations of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Romeo and Juliet." This summer, the group will peform "The Taming of the Shrew" on July 25-26. Auditions will be held at 7 p.m. on May 28 in Hufnagle Park. Hartman looks forward to participating.

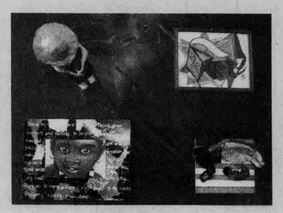
"We decided while addressing societal issues was important, so was art for art's sake," McCormick said of the switch in theatrical genres introduced by the Shakespeare in the Park event.

The extensive list of the group's credits includes "An Evening of Edgar Allan Poe," "You Don't Know Jack: A Lesson in Kerouac," an oral interpretation workshop and two programs at the Donald L. Heiter Community Center focusing on Martin Luther King Jr.

Gaspipe is dedicated to its mission statement, which reads, "To produce both classic and original plays for public entertainment and to use theater to address societal issues."

"This means," McCormick said, "that we are committed to the works of Shakespeare, Marlowe [and] Molière, as well as original plays that company members write and develop, and we are committed to serving the needs of central Pennsylvania through the work of important nonprofit organizations of the Susquehanna Valley."

Black Arts Festival a success



The annual Black Arts Festival comprised an entire weekend, showcased black arts at the University. Events included an art contest, a dance showcase, a theater production, a craft center workshop and a def-poetry hotbox.

In a talent showcase designed to compliment the Black Arts Festival theme of "Returning to our Roots," dance reigned supreme April 5 in the Terrace Room. Master of ceremonies Kellen Smith '03 excitedly introduced not only Jelani, the University's hip-hop dance troupe and feature performers, but several other guest groups as well. The Bison Girls gave a performance in true Bison Girl tradition; brothers from Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc. performed step; Fuego Latino, a troupe from Susquehanna University, performed Latin dances; and S.E.C.R.E.T. Entertainment, a group composed of three professional dancers, made moves reminiscent of steps in an Usher music video.

Vice President of Jelani Jaifi Lewis '03 said she was excited about Jelani's guests.

"Our showcase is held every year ... not only to highlight our organization, but to display the amazing talent of other groups. In the end, it's all about bringing people together to have a great time, performers and audience members alike," Lewis said.

Jelani embraced the festival's theme as both step and dance routines reflected the influence of the African-American culture. The troupe adhered to its mission statement to "create and produce rhythmic movements ... via performances and educational programming that embodies the rhythms, history and the influence of Mother Africa."

This goal was reached through the performance of a piece choreographed by India Branch '03. The expressive routine was pulled directly from the African inspiration, which the group wants to express and share. The deep beat of drums and African song provided inspiration for exaggerated movements that resembled the step performances of the night with freer and more vivid motions. The uninhibited dancing style coupled with the joyful music brought to mind an African tribal dance used in the telling of a jubilant story or in the worship of the sun.

Other dances were innovative in "recovering their roots," using rhythm and beat learned through African culture with the addition of a modern twist. Such performances included various step routines and a dance that recalled more recent roots with Rob Base's 1980's classic "It Takes Two."

Most impressive throughout the showcase was the effort of all the groups to engage the audience and ensure that they experienced the show through interaction.

"Dancing with Jelani is incredible—the wild adrenaline rush you have with every major performance, the sessions to create moves filled with attitude and style and the hours outside of practice that you spend with other Jelani members just hanging out. That is the Jelani experience," Lewis said.

The experience was extended to the audience and the excitement was clearly infectious as many spectators cheered on the dancing and even showed off a few moves of their own. The interaction with the audience was extended as the group invited them to a party held at Uptown celebrating the showcase's success.

Started in 1999, Jelani has built its reputation for drawing crowds. The performance has once more proven that the group truly reflects its mission of using "the powerful tool of rhythm to celebrate, uplift, motivate and inspire" to live up to the Swahili meaning of their name, "mighty."

Anyone who knows Strickland can vouch that she is a friend to students and colleagues; someone who strives to make life better at the University.

In 2000, Carolyn Strickland was hired out of Susquehanna University to become the Associate Director of Campus Activities and Programs. Little did she know how involved in individual aspects of University life she would become. Strickland is not only the Associate Director of Campus Activities and Programs, but she is also the University adviser for Chi Omega sorority and a Sexual Assault Survivor Advocate. Along with Swartz Social space Manager Tasha Heim and Associat"Laura has truly been an inspiration to me, and I consider myself a better person for having known her," close friend Sarah McCaughey '03 said. Dean of Students Kari Conrad, Strickland is responsible for organizing most of the options Activities and Campus Events (ACE) offers students on weekends.

Conrad said she is appreciative of Strickland's work.

"I am blessed for the strong staff in my office making sure everything that we do is of high quality, and Carolyn is an integral part of this team. When she came here from Susquehanna, Carolyn was mostly involved in the reorganization of the Activities and Campus Events," Conrad said. "Prior to her arrival, that particular aspect of the University functioned in a much different capacity. However, Carolyn has made things much more effective and the quality has been incredible."

BU After Dark is a popular popular activity of which Strickland ia a part. With its carnival-like atmosphere including games, an abundance of food and competitions, the event became a quick-

John Miller

Professor of Management

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

"Make as big a difference in the world as your creativity, your sensitivity and your resources will permit."

Professor of Management John Miller offers this challenge to the 130 students enrolled in the hugely popular Management 101 (MG101) course he created and teaches at the University.

After 25 years of full-time developing and instructing MG101, Miller is reducing his course load to teach only in the spring semester. His next challenge is to write a book and develop materials about MG101.

"Professor Miller is MG101 ... inside and outside of the classroom," Kristin Abromitis '04 said.

A fixture in the management department, Miller is inspirational to both students and faculty.

"John Miller was the first person I met from Bucknell some 23 years ago when I interviewed for a faculty position. I knew immediately that I was talking with someone who had a unique and valued perspective on undergraduate management education. John has been a colleague who has taught many of us about the meaning and the value of management studies in a liberal learning environment," Professor of Management Tim Sweeney said. "John is a friend and a colleague, and there simply aren't very many days that go by when I personally don't learn something from the man!"

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

John Miller began the Management 101 program at the University. Institutions across the country have used this program.

Miller shares MG101 teaching duties with another management professor each semester. Assistant Professor of Management Jamie Hendry, who is teaching alongside Miller this semester, described his colleague as passionate and dedicated to hands-on management education.

"This is my first semester teaching with John Miller, and I'm amazed at John's passion for this class! He's been teaching MG101 for nearly 25 years, and yet his enthusiasm for it is still palpable," Hendry said. "He's fascinated by anything having to do with organizations, by the ways people come together and organize so they can accomplish all sorts of tasks. He's always thinking about it, reading about it, asking penetrating questions, trying to figure out why it happens and

Despite incidents, Senior Night continues

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

A physical altercation ensued among members of the senior class following the March 20 Senior Night, resulting in the arrest of three members of the senior class for physically assaulting another student.

"The last Senior Night was successful and safe with respect to the events at the venue, Italian Terrace. However, after the event, a group of seniors exited the provided buses and proceeded to assault a Bucknell student," Senior Class President Laura Day said.

Incidents involving students under the influence of alcohol have occurred during the last two Senior Nights causing the University administration to question the safety of students at Senior Nights.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro is pleased with the majority of students' behavior on Senior Nights, as well as the responsibility of the senior class officers. He said there are still some problems.

"There is a concern about being served dangerous kinds of drinks, where the students are not always sure how many shots are in them and they cannot reckon what is in the drink. There is also a concern about people who drink too much and subsequently become aggressive, which some people have the tendency to do," Ferraro said.

Although there have been some problems in the past, senior class officers are working in conjunction with the administration to ensure that the tradition of Senior Night continues.

"All the deans, including those of student life and Greek life, have expressed support for Senior Nights, provided that they can be a safe and healthy social event," Day said. "On the whole, the administration has been fantastic at accommodating student concerns and working to compromise with the class government."

For years, senior classes have planned monthly outings for graduating seniors to socialize in a non-University setting, celebrating their last year in college. Seniors are bused to and from Senior Night locations such as The Italian Terrace and La Primavera, where they fraternize for a few hours on a weekday night.

Ferraro commended the senior officers and the students who take precautions.

"I have been impressed with the officers and their responsibility and the vast majority of students have done well when they attend Senior Nights. However, you don't need a lot of exceptions for a problem. You have to credit the leaders and the majority of students

Manning celebrates 104 years of life

The children of Beaver Memorial United Methodist Church added another number to their banner as Professor Emeritus Dr. Wayne Manning celebrated his 104th birthday on Saturday. The children of the congregation created the banner to commemorate Manning's 100th birthday and each year they continue to add one.

Friends from the church, the University and others celebrated Manning's birthday in Marlow Hall at Riverwoods, Manning's residence since late last year. With the cakes, ice cream and various other foods prepared and donated by friends, Professor of Biology Warren Abrahamson gave a presentation illustrating some of the achievements in Manning's lifetime, which crosses three centuries.

Before coming to the University, the roots of Manning's commitments to a lifelong study of plants were firmly established in two trips across the country in 1916 and 1920. Both trips were UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed several students playing beer pong in the basement of Sigma Chi Fraternity. Five students were identified and admitted to drinking alcohol although under the age of 21. The students were issued citations for underage consumption. The fraternity was cited for beer game violations.

VANDALISM/CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) broke a window pane in the main door at Hunt Hall. The incident is under investigation.

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed two students carrying alcoholic beverages in plastic cups while walking in front of the Ward House. Public Safety stopped the students, who admitted to drinking alcohol although under the age of 21. The students were cited for underage consumption.

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—A student reported to Public Safety that a visitor was lying unresponsive in a bed in Vedder Hall. Public Safety arrived and determined that the individual was intoxicated and under the age of 21. Emergency Medical Services transported the ill female to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment. Lewisburg Police Department cited her for underage consumption.

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to a fire alarm activation at Swartz Hall. Upon arrival, Public Safety determined that unknown person(s) activated a pull station for no apparent reason. The incident is under investigation.

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION/PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—Public Safety and Lewisburg Police Department responded to South Sixth and St. George streets for the report of an intoxicated student who fled the area when an R&P Security Officer requested identification. The student admitted to Public Safety that he did consume alcohol although under the age of 21. Citations were issued for underage consumption and public drunkenness.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT—An employee advised Public Safety that a male was brandishing a knife at Kinney Natatorium. Public Safety arrived and determined that the visitor did have a knife and was intoxicated. Public Safety obtained the knife from the male. East Buffalo Police Department was contacted and responded to escort the individual off campus. A citation for disorderly conduct was issued.

ARSON—A student reported to Public Safety that a dumpster was on fire outside of Taylor Hall. Public Safety and William Cameron Engine Company responded and extinguished the fire. The incident is under investigation.

Manning celebrates 104th birthday with students, friends coordinated through Oberlin College. The second trip consisted of four Model T Fords, a truck and among the researchers, his future wife Peg.

After graduating from Oberlin in 1920, Manning attended Cornell University to complete his doctorate and then went on to teach at the University of Illinois and Smith College. With the onset of World War II, Manning lost his position at Smith College, but pursued educating and helping people by teaching basic mathematics to factory workers. Finally, in 1944, Manning applied for teaching positions at many universities and was accepted by Bucknell.

During his 23 years at the University Manning left three great legacies, all of which he continues to support, Abraham said.

When Manning began his career at the University, there were no plants in the greenhouse, During his tenure, Manning and his wife built the collection to over 400 plant species. Without Manning's efforts the greenhouse that now sits atop the Biology Building would not have been the quality collection it is today. Manning and his students also embarked on the development of a preserved plant collection.

The second legacy, The Wayne E. Manning Herbarium, currently holds 22,000 specimens of plants, more than 7,000 of Manning collected. This growing database continues to aid in the protection and preservation of endangered species of plants, as well as serving as a vital database for advancements in the studies of plants.

Manning's third legacy involves the type of relationship with students and others that he and his wife tried to create. With the establishment of the Wayne and Margaret Manning Internship in Botanical Sciences, an internship that supports student research, it is clear that Manning continues to try to take students under his wing and support them in their endeavors.

"He has clearly touched the hearts, souls and minds of so many people," said Professor Don Stone of Duke University said.

Abrahamson recalls students talking about their relationships with the couple as they were welcomed to their home and how Manning served as a mentor for so many.

"He was a pioneer at Bucknell," Abrahamson said.

In particular, Abrahamson admires Manning's pursuit of fulfilling a teacher-scholar role. Manning believed that teachers continually involved in research in their fields helped to make better teachers.

Manning's influence extends beyond faculty and students to the campus community.

"To know him is to get completely pulled in by his charm, his sense of humor, and his intellect," Keri Albright, a good friend of Manning who helped plan his 104th birthday, said.

who are responsible for picking up the slack," Ferraro said.

Ferraro also credited the buses for ensuring student safety during Senior Nights.

"Even small amounts of alcohol can impair someone's driving and reaction time. The officers of the senior class, in previous years as well, have insisted on everyone using the buses to be transported to and from the location of the event," Ferraro said.

The senior class officers and the administration are committed to increasing the safety at the Senior Nights. A set of guidelines has been drawn up, placing new requirements on senior nights after an student was transported to the hospital during a February Senior Night after over-consuming alcohol. Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad, the senior class adviser and the officers have worked hard to put these guidelines in effect. Seniors over 21 can now only drink a measured amount of alcohol, not a mixed drink where there is uncertainty as to the amount of alcohol.

"This past Senior Night was a trial run of Senior Nights with the new provisions," Day said. The class officers and representatives hoped this would curtail binge [drinking] and overconsumption at the event. The class representatives have also been diligent in allowing only the eligible students to attend and enforcing the guidelines, including the requirement to take the required transportation." Only seniors over 21 years old are can attend Senior nights.

Two more senior nights are scheduled for the Class of 2003, and the new guidelines will be in effect for these events.

Due to the support of the administration and the responsibility of the students and class officers, the future of Senior Nights is positive.

Bucknellian corrections:

In the March 28 issue, some of the information in the front page story "Zeta Phi Beta joins Greek community" was incorrect. The adviser from the Gamma Iota Chapter submitted a letter to the editor this week which clarifies the information. See page A7.

In the April 4 issue, the quote by Candice Hinckley on page A6 should have read " ... Those of us who lived through the Vietnam era remember that among the myriad mistakes that were made, one particularly egregious infraction was that made against the soldiers themselves, who were tormented or shunned or otherwise damned for doing what our government asked them to do ..."

In the April 11 issue, Kevin Costner's daughter on page B7 ("Costner creates commotion" was misidentified as Annie, who is the older daughter of Costner. Lily is the daughter pictured.

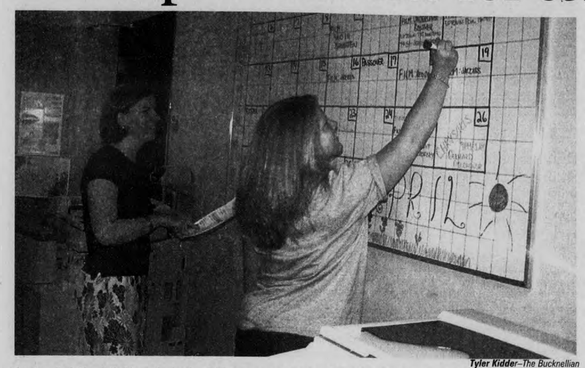
Strickland contributes to planning of campus activities for students



Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Carolyn Strickland (left) works in the CAP center, acts as the adviser for Chi Omega Sorority and is a rape counselor at the University. Students and faculty agree that she is friends to students, while remaining professional.

success.

"I heard from students that they wanted more events, only later in the evening, so I did the research and proposed the idea to my colleagues and Dean Conrad. I may have initiated it after the students insisted on more late-night activities, but many people in my department are responsible for it being what it is today," Strickland said.

Strickland is also involved in Building on Foundations (BOF). Four years ago, BOF was created as a pre-orientation program, where students who engage in leadership activities. Most recently, Strickland has taken over the role as the program's advisor. She started the BOF Reunion, in which former BOF participants come together and share experiences.

With all the activities in which Strickland is involved, Conrad still feels that her forte is her interaction with students.

"When I think about Carolyn's strength, it is her relationships with the students who come in and out of her office. Students are always in there, whether talking about ACE, their academics or their personal life," Conrad said. "I do have a lot of respect for Carolyn, in that she is very professional, yet she manages to also be friends to the students that she comes in contact with every day."

Strickland became adviser to Chi Omega in 2001 at the request of two of the sorority's sisters.

"She was not a member of a Greek organization before becoming our adviser but she became a special initiate in 2001. She chose to be a special initiate of Chi-Omega in order to become more fully involved in the chapter," President of Chi-Omega Marie DeAngelis '04 said.

Strickland was recently awarded the 2002 Most Outstanding University Adviser Award by the Interfraternity Council (IFC) and the Panhellenic Council.

"Carolyn has been a huge influence in our chapter and an amazing resource. She is very knowledgeable about the Plan for Prominence and other aspects of Greek Life at Bucknell," DeAngelis said. "She serves as the direct adviser to some of the chapter officers and also as a liaison between our chapter and the University. She has helped us out a lot with setting goals and planning. She is knowledgeable about the many resources on campus and how to utilize them."

Strickland is also on-call if there is a sexual assault on campus. If a survivor is in need of assistance or just wants someone to talk to, Strickland is there.

Colleagues laud Strickland's involement in University life.

"When I think of what it means to be a professional, I think of Carolyn. She multitasks and she is ethical, loyal, committed, makes quality a top priority and is concerned with her own self-growth," Conrad said. "By that I mean she is constantly challenging herself to look for new, creative ways of doing things."

Recently, Strickland won an award from the National Association of Campus Activities.

After this academic year Strickland will be leaving the University to become the Director of Campus Activities at Penn College.

She learned a lot from her experiences and thoroughly enjoyed her years here.

"What made my job great were my good relationships with the students, whether in ACE, Greek System, IFC, Panhellenic Council or Chi Omega. It was important to reach all types of student groups on campus and by building the relationships, the programming that we can provide is improved. That is why an open-door policy with students is so important," Strickland said.

Strickland said she will use what she has learned here in her future endeavors.

"I gained a lot of new skills here from projects, but I also learned a little from every student. Sometimes students don't realize how much we as administrators can learn from them, such as their backgrounds, future goals and classes. This is what keeps my job exciting and this is why I love what I do," Strickland said.

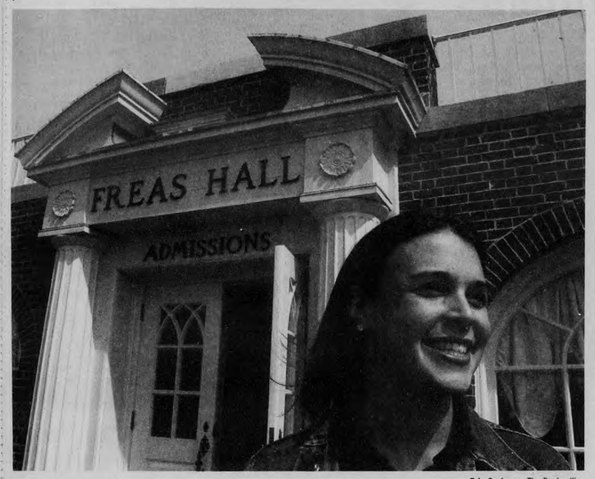
~2003 Spotlight Profiles~



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Class of 2003 President Laura Day is known for her continuous smile. Day is a former Bucknellian editor, is a member of Alpha Chi Omega Sorority and is actively involved in the Bucknell Student Government.

Laura Day '03

Class of 2003 President

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Class of 2003 President Laura Day's infectious smile is well-known on both academic and extracurricular corners of campus. Dedicated to the University community, Day is actively involved in the Bucknell Student Government (BSG), a sister of Alpha Chi Omega Sorority, former News and Managing editor of The Bucknellian and works in the Admissions Office.

Responsible for representing the student body on committees for the Cable TV Task Force, the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid and the Vision 2010 Steering committee, Day commits herself to bettering the campus.

"Laura is an enthusiastic and fun person who excels in life because of her passion and focus and determination to pursue her dreams," best friend Rachel Kroger '03 said. "Laura is a person of integrity, sincerity and enthusiasm for life."

Vice President Charles Pollock '70, who has worked with Day in many contexts over the past few years, considers her "the quintessential Bucknell student."

"She is always the first person to volunteer her time and energy," Admissions Counselor Kate Peltz said. "I do not know how she refuels or regroups, but she must, somehow, because she never omits a detail, falters on a promise or forgets a responsibility."

Assistant Dean of Students Kari Conrad has worked closely with Day both as the adviser to BSG and to the senior class.

"She has done so much for BSG," Conrad said. "I think she would be described by her peers as 'the voice of reason.' When Laura speaks at a BSG meeting, it's sensible, it's timely and she is just so respected by her peers."

In addition to her strong leadership skills, Day is also an excellent student.

Thanks to hard work and devotion, Day has a 3.96 grade point average and is a member of Phi Beta Kappa Honor Society. Day was also accepted into Stanford Law School, which she will attend in the fall.

"She knows how to work really hard, but also to live life to the fullest, making incredibly fun memories along the way," Kroger said.

"I have never seen a frown on this woman's face," Assistant Professor of French and Francophone Studies Renee Gosson said.

Day was a student in Gosson's class during her sophomore year. Intended for French majors, typically seniors who had already been immersed in French culture after a semester abroad, Day still earned the highest grade in the class. Gosson attributed this success to an aspect of Day's precocity.

"Laura is unique because of how much she has done for our school. She has worked hard for four years to get cable on this campus, she has brainstormed innovative ideas for class events and has initiated many positive changes on campus," friend and fellow BSG member Hannah Young '03 said.

Conrad described Day's work ethic as "second to none." Day is always careful to selflessly represent her constituency to the best of her ability.

"Laura is probably one of the most ethical, hard-working, intelligent go-getters that I've ever met. She is compassionate; she cares about doing the right thing. When Laura takes on any task you know that that is going to be done with style and grace and follow through," Conrad said.

"Laura has truly been an inspiration to me, and I consider myself a better person for having known her," close friend Sarah McCaughey '03 said.

Professors and friends alike are quick to note Day's natural ability to tactfully speak her mind, always stating what she truly believes and never backing down from a challenge.

Her assertive personality does not prevent her from looking out for the concerns of others.

"Above all, Laura is devoted to people," Peltz said. "She values her family, is a steadfast friend and someone on whom others depend ... the remarkable thing is that Laura's character is as, if not more, impressive than her résumé."

Day will be graduating with a major in international relations and French, with a minor in Japanese.

"I am so excited for her future," Conrad said. "I hope she stays connected to the institution for a long time ... and I think she will because she is a true Bucknellian."

Aaron DeRosa '03 poses with the Slam Hammer, on which his name is inscribed as a winner of the poetry slam series. A senior editor for The Bucknellian, DeRosa exhibits his trademark wit in his column, "Me Like Sportz."

Aaron DeRosa '03

Poetry Slam Committee Founder

By Jeff Day and Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer and Arts & Entertainment Editor

"I want to have that man's babies!" Certainly not an exclamation heard by everyone—yet a certain blue-hatted boy has heard it more than once. Instantly recognizable, the blue hat's reputation precedes the person of Aaron DeRosa '03.

Professors call DeRosa a charming, outgoing and inquisitive student. His friends call him witty, intelligent, giving and a genuine mentor. His close friends call him too big for his britches. And why not? DeRosa can boast of more leadership positions than one can shake a stick at, among them chief editor of Mirth Grinder, sports and senior editor of The Bucknellian, founder and president of the Poetry Slam Committee, Homecoming Host, Mr. Bucknell 2001, member of Omicron Delta Kappa Honor Society, former Associate Editor of Red Wheelbarrow and former West Branch editorial intern. More importantly, and into the campus weekly. Rachel Laskow, former editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian, said that not only is DeRosa a fantastic writer, but he also always makes time for his friends, work and helping out others.

According to Peter Hackeman, Opinions editor for The Bucknellian, "Aaron is one of the few people who can make editing and placing articles all night a fun experience. His graduation this May will certainly leave our staff with a void of comedy and good humor. Rather than try to replace him with another funny person or a committee of comedians, we are planning to worship his blue hat in hopes that he will return some day to amuse a future staff of the paper."

DeRosa's involvement with Mirth Grinder is another example of his literary involvement on campus. As chief editor, DeRosa was a source of ideas and inspiration to the Mirth Grinder staff.

"Aaron is a natural-born leader. He inspires others with his charm, biting wit and magnetic personality. He has expressed an interest and enthusiasm for poetry that remains unparalleled by any other student I have met," Rebecca Wadlinger '06 said.

DeRosa's accomplishments are not limited to extracurricular activities, but extend into the classroom as well.

He was awarded the 2002 University Prize for Men, a prize for English literature and composition. DeRosa plans to extend his academic pursuits with a Ph.D. in English.

According to Assistant Professor of Comparative Humanities John Hunter, DeRosa has an intellectual maturity far ahead of his years—he welcomes debate and disagreement as opportunities to learn and changes his mind when proven wrong.

Assistant Professor of East Asian Studies Erik Lofgren described DeRosa as a sensitive, inquisitive student with a good head on his shoulders.

"Aaron seems to truly enjoy the academic project, and believes that he can learn from and contribute to it," Lofgren said.

John Rickard, chair of the English department, called DeRosa an engaged and energetic student who is eager to learn, intellectually alive and very articulate.

"He genuinely enjoys learning new things and encountering new authors. He has a great sense of humor, which informs his papers and class presentations. Aaron's involvement in English at Bucknell went far beyond his coursework," Rickard said.

Graduation will mark the completion of an outstanding and successful college career for DeRosa, who will graduate with honors in English. While DeRosa will attend Northeastern University to pursue a doctorate in English literature, his impact on the University will continue to be felt by future classes.

"It has been a privilege to work with Aaron. He has helped all of us become better journalists and better people. It may be a common comment about a graduating senior, but Aaron really will leave our school and these organizations better off than he found them. He has inspired the people he works with and that is the mark of a true leader," Hackeman said.

> DeRosa refuses to take individual credit for the success that he has been involved in.
> When first asked to talk about his accomplishments, DeRosa deflected credit and dismissed the idea of individual achievement, instead focusing on the help that peers and professors have provided. When pressed further, he continued to talk about the students that he has worked with over his four years. Finally, he firmly said, "I hate talking about myself." When asked to repeat an earlier quote, as if to confirm the point, DeRosa said, "I don't remember." The sly smile on his face told a different tale, but he steadfastly refused to take personal credit for the many contributions he has made to student life on campus.
> He describes his motivation to write as similar to that of construction—he likes to see things happen and prefers to build with his words. DeRosa's founding of the Poetry Slam Committee represents his most obvious and lasting contribution. The poetry slam is now a twice-a-semester literary exhibition featuring professional poets and students who perform their pieces with a vigor and vitality not always associated with poetry.
> "He is always a leader and always a riot. Slam wouldn't be what it is at Bucknell if it weren't for Aaron's dedication, spirit and humor," Kristin Robbins '03 said.
> According to next year's Slam Committee co-chair, Christina Macmillan '05, the poetry slam series would not be in existence without DeRosa. As mentor to Macmillan, DeRosa is extremely determined, hardworking and dedicated.
> "He has such a deep love for poetry and writing, and it shows through in everything that he does," Macmillan said.
> Both slams held this spring were attended by an audience overflowing the 7th Street Café. While many students were there to see their friends perform and some to see the professional slammers, nearly all were impressed by the diminutive, blue-capped emcee. His slams are always among the most remembered and admired, many for their unusual wit and honesty.

Founder of MG 101 makes impact

Universities around the country have adopted the program the Miller started

what factors tend to lead to organizational success."

Miller said that MG101 is an important for everybody, not just management majors.

"Even if students want to be doctors and lawyers and not take business classes, in this class students will learn how to get tasks done working with other people," Miller said. "The class is not about learning how to sell T-shirts. It's about learning how to work with others. It is especially for people who will never have another formal chance to learn about organization and management."

That realization, made while teaching at Yale, was Miller's inspiration for developing MG101. Miller launched the course full-time at Bucknell in the fall of 1979 and has been chairman of the board for all 184 Bucknell MG101 companies.

An article based on his work with experiential management project courses appeared in the spring 1991 edition of "The Journal of Management Education." As a result of that article, and other publicity concerning experiential and general education courses, Miller has been invited to design and offer versions of MG101 at universities in the United States and Europe.

There are currently 30 schools that run classes based on MG101, including several graduate schools. At Babson College in Massachusetts, all first-year students are required to take a class based on Miller's brainchild.

Management Department Chair Nancy Weida applauded Miller's advances in management education.

"His teaching interests are focused on the special needs of undergraduate students of management, but he also teaches advanced courses and graduate seminars in organization and management theory and practice. Professor Miller has received multiple awards for excellence in teaching, service-learning curriculum development and contributions to the community," Weida said. "He's also a member of the Susquehanna Chorale, and is active in numerous organizations at Bucknell such as the Weis Center. He is a respected faculty leader, and the most wonderful person."

Miller designed the service project component of MG101 to help organizations both on and off campus.

"Professor Miller's best contributions can't even be measured—the number of service hours and amount of money donated to such a wide range of causes because of Professor Miller is astounding," MG101 Teaching Assistant Dan Opperthauser '03 said.

Companies have helped to build a transition home for Lewisburg High School special-needs students, cleaned the Montandon Marsh and organized carnivals for children. To date charitable donations collected from past companies are valued at over $100,000.

"The benefits of learning through experience in MG101 are unparalleled by any other course. Students learn not only learning from course material, but also from this reflection. Professor Miller should be commended for developing a course that is different from others and fun for the student," Joey Alfano '05 said.

In recognition of his continued devotion to community service among students, Miller was rewarded with the Forrest D. Brown Award in 2002, given in appreciation for outstanding community service and for affecting the lives of University students by sharing with them the value of community service.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Professor of Management John Miller founded the Management 101 program at the University. He also teaches upper-level and graduate seminars for the Management program.

Miller is currently working on a capstone version of MG101 to be taught in the spring of 2004. The details of the course are still in the works, but Miller is certain that the class will entail a pedagogical teaching method forcing students to balance theory and practice.

Miller was also chosen to be a Carnegie Fellow in 1998, one of 15 outstanding U.S. college and university faculty members selected for inventing and sharing new models of teaching.

In addition to consulting with other universities on how they can present courses similar to Bucknell's MG101, Miller has given workshops and consulted with public and private organizations.

Miller's colleagues also admire his appreciation for the University.

"John cares deeply about the larger institution that is Bucknell and he has the ability to identify and articulate long-term strategic issues that are important to the University," Assistant Professor of Accounting Michael Coyne said.

Every day Miller continues to influence students and faculty.

"As a newcomer to the department, he sets a very high standard, but one that it is inspiring to strive for," Visiting Assistant Professor of Management Jordi Comas said.

Senior Nights a University tradition valued by students

Carnival is a celebration of indulgences and rejuvenation. It is a time in which people worldwide bid "farewell to the flesh," as the etymology of the term implies, and prepare for the abstinence and introspection that characterizes the liturgical season of Lent.

For the senior class, Senior Nights are their Carnival—one final opportunity to relax and enjoy the company of classmates in preparation for the seriousness and newfound responsibility of a career or graduate education awaiting them after Commencement. Seniors look forward to these opportunities after long days of writing their theses, student teaching or completing their senior design projects.

Unfortunately, a February Senior Night during which a senior was transported to the hospital for overconsumption resulted in the University administration questioning the safety and reconsidering the future of Senior Night.

The incident also caused concern over the serious liability issues—sponsoring an event in which alcohol will be consumed and entrusting the majority of the supervision of these events to the senior class officers and representatives—that the University might incur by sponsoring the event.

Despite this incident, Senior Nights have been permitted to continue with increased restrictions on admittance and hard-alcohol consumption.

Now, students again find the future of Senior Nights in question when three students physically assaulted one of their classmates after getting off the bus from a March Senior Night.

These incidents are a result of the inappropriate behavior of a few students and are certainly not indicative of the behavior of the class as a whole. The Class of 2003, or any future class, should not be punished as a result of the irresponsible behavior of a few.

Students also recognize and appreciate the potential liability issues that the University faces by sponsoring Senior Nights. If this is truly an issue that concerns the University, requesting that students sign waiver forms would alleviate fears about the legal issues surrounding the event. Most students would likely be receptive to signing such a document to assure that Senior Nights could continue.

Senior Nights enable all members of the class—liberal arts students, engineering students, Greeks and independents—to bond as a whole and unify in a way that they may not have been able since first-year student orientation. These precious few evenings are some the last opportunities that the graduating class will have to be together before they don caps and gowns for Commencement.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro has indicated that from his perspective the continuance of Senior Nights is "positive." Hopefully, any future administrative decision regarding Senior Night will reflect the importance of this tradition for University students.

Our embrace of warfare as a problem-solver

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

I have read from the local newspaper that students at the recent support the troops rally on campus expressed an odd fascination with the concept of war. I refer to the idea that war, as a concept, has been a great agent of change for humanity. War has helped us to rid the planet of such ills as slavery, the Nazi threat, the communist threat and I suppose we can give warfare credit for medical breakthroughs like antibiotics developed during war. French emperor Napoleon Bonaparte can be given credit for the method of canning food for preservation as he commissioned the initial research enabling the canning of food for his massive armies. War has been a change agent for mankind, but not without an enduring human cost.

The millions who died during the 20th century, the bloodiest of all, might want to differ with those who see a bright and cheery side to wars both cold and hot.

The last century provides proof that war really does breed war and is not a curative but a curse for winners and losers. The dangerous argument for the positive side of war is that it is to "end disputes" or to rid us of the threat of the moment. The addictive nature of war gives the illusion to the practitioners on both sides that they are giving an effective remedy to the problem at hand, while war is simultaneously brewing up enemies for the next conflict. World War II allies Soviet Russia became an enemy for 50 years that sparked proxy wars across the globe. Guatemala, Iran, Vietnam, Nicaragua and El Salvador became battlefields as millions died in conflicts over ideology. The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency worked to overthrow elected governments in Iran and Chile, and we wonder why others might hate us enough to attack us. There is no excuse for the suffering inflicted on Sept. 11, but we must understand that nothing happens without sufficient reason. That is why rhetorical arguments for the positive side of war bodes ill for the future.

As you can see even the experts are beginning to advocate for perpetual warfare as an honorable solution to waging peace.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 attracted a young Osama bin Laden to fight the Soviets, as the U.S. CIA trained the forefathers of the Taliban. The Taliban's training empowered its members to take over the Afghan government and serve up its own flavor of religious oppression that bred terrorism. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein fought against Iran for eight years with our aid and blessing until he used gas against the Kurds. After the Gulf War win under former U.S. President George Bush, current U.S. President George W. Bush has now defeated Iraq with a truly first-class military and the technology behind 15,000 smart bombs. Are we ready for the role of world policeman? Are we getting to enjoy the role a bit too much? Are we acclimating ourselves to understand war as an effective tool of choice? There are many signs that this may be true.

Tom Friedman of The New York Times thinks that congratulations over the Iraqi win should be postponed for the moment. Whether we like it or not, those 15,000 bombs paid for by American taxpayers exploded on the oversstressed people of Iraq suffering under severe economic sanctions for over 10 years. As Friedman said, "Since we finally broke Iraq, we essentially own the primary responsibility to fix and normalize the country." We must get this done correctly or all faults from the lack of medicine and food and water to bomb damage will be ours. Friedman said that we should get all the help we can to do this from the United Nations "since the political and economic costs of occupation will be enormous." Friedman sees this as a "scene of humiliation not liberation" to the Iraqi people since humanitarian aid is slow in coming and the death toll from rioting is rising. Our military personnel are not trained as policemen. Looting and revenge killings are now becoming common among the Iraqi population after years of pent up frustrations.

Victor Hanson's book "An Autumn of War" states, "War can be good and that sometimes nations are better off using devastation than persuasion." Hanson's warm embrace of war may be working on the American public. "As Fox News revels in its coverage of the conflict, polls are showing a stoic attitude toward the dead and wounded so far," according to Maureen Dowd's column. "Ex-CIA chief, James Woolsey predicts that this conflict will go on for years as we restructure the Middle East." Woolsey listed the next list of enemies in the Middle East struggle, Iranian Shia, Hezbollah, Syrian Baathists and Islamist Sunni of al-Qaida and affiliated terrorist groups." The next enemy is ready to be cast and given an appropriately "evil" persona or representative face.

We are trapped in a cage with a lion held by the ears if we continue to embrace war over diplomacy, however slow and cumbersome it is in practice. As you can see even the experts are beginning to advocate for perpetual warfare as an honorable solution to waging peace. If war is part of the permanent human condition we better get it under control quickly before the technology gets any more efficient. We have the next enemy in our sights and Fox News and Al-Jazeera stand ready as reality television gets more real—as the American public sits down to watch the next television war and our comfort with war grows.

Letters to the editor

Spring concert review fails to reflect true student view

To the Editor:

I would like to express my dissatisfaction with Chad Flood's review of the Spring Concert with Third Eye Blind and G. Love and Special Sauce. I think it gives the readers of The Bucknellian a misrepresentation of what the concert experience was actually like. Though I can't argue that attendance was less than spectacular for the opening of the Sojka Pavilion as a concert venue, I do believe that many of the concert-goers were there to see Third Eye Blind. I didn't enjoy G. Love's performance, and many people around me at the concert seemed to share my distaste. I found G. Love's stage show less than stellar, with its lead singer sitting on a stool for most of the set, the song vocals inaudible and many of the songs sounding exactly the same. I disagree with Flood's interpretation of Third Eye Blind's performance. I think the band put on an amazing show.

The article argued Third Eye Blind's new songs displeased the crowd and that "the band [had] to appease its old fans by playing past hits." This is ludicrous, since concerts these days tend to follow a set list created before the show even starts. The article also reasoned that "people seemed to feel slighted knowing specific hits they could have heard were ignored and replaced with new songs." This is a little inaccurate since Third Eye Blind played all of its radio hits from its debut album ("Semi-Charmed Life," "How's It Going To Be" and "Jumper") as well "Motorcycle Driveby" (a fan favorite), and "Never Let You Go" from its second album, "Blue." The band also played covers of some of its personal favorite songs such as Led Zeppelin's "Stairway to Heaven" and The Clash's "Should I Stay or Should I Go."

One noticeable moment of the night that was left out was Stephan Jenkins' efforts to thank Jessica Lynch (a 19-year-old prisoner of war in Iraq who was rescued recently) by taking photos of the concert and having posters available after the show to sign and be sent to her in Germany. Stephan Jenkins' interaction with the audience, most noticeably his remark that "crowd-surfing is for chicks, not guys," combined with the band's excellent musicianship contributed to a performance that definitely outshined that of G. Love and Special Sauce. Overall, the spring concert may not have been a sold-out bash (filling up a 4,000-seat arena in Lewisburg, Pa., is easier said than done), but I think those in attendance thoroughly enjoyed the concert due solely to Third Eye Blind's performance.

Sincerely,

Chris Stokes '06

Silent Protester thirsty for attention

To the Editor:

This letter comes to you as part of my reaction to a picture published in your newspaper. A picture of a painted man was shown on the cover of your April 11 edition, with the title, "Silent Protest." The student portrayed in the picture was playing the statue game as a way to protest the war in Iraq.

In response to the painted man's act of silence, one senior told your correspondent, "I think it's very effective. I think he accomplished what he wanted to do." I disagree totally. To stand motionless for a day does not benefit anyone. It doesn't help our troops abroad. Frankly, our leaders could care less.

To stand motionless for a day does not benefit anyone. It doesn't help our troops abroad.

Most Bucknellians that I talked to thought the guy was doing some sort of interactive art project. He had no arguments to raise against war. He changed no one's opinion about war. He may have initiated some discussion about his choice of body paint, but beyond that, he served no one.

His actions are similar to Vietnam protesters who set themselves on fire or lay in streets with heavy traffic. These people were ultimately thirsty for attention. They were fueled, not by the war effort and not by our endangered troops, but out of a need for attention for themselves. They usually succeeded in amassing a certain degree of self-pity, especially if they committed suicide.

Likewise, people who try to fight AIDS can often be seen assembled in rallies with red ribbons. Those people think they're serving sick people, but in reality, their ribbons mean jack squat for a sick person. Their actions don't even affect sick people indirectly. Demonstrations staged by protesters like the painted man should be taken for what they are—meager attempts to draw attention to oneself, in spite of real issues and real arguments that the protester is too cowardly to address.

Sincerely,

Martin Wade '06

Dean of diversity article oversimplifies culture

To the Editor:

Senior Tom Elliott's article "New dean for diversity is a mistake" lackadaisically thunders against several complex issues in a way that misunderstands the nature of multiculturalism and cultural uniqueness. He does so in three main ways: 1) arguing that cultures can be compared, but not providing an actual standard for such evaluation (in fact, he implies that "Western culture" is this yardstick); 2) treating cultures as though they exist in homogenous isolation from all other cultures since time immemorial; 3) examples smacking of nativism, nationalism, racism and an over-reliance on stereotypes in reference to issues that warrant far more complex interpretations.

The implementation of multiculturalism at the University certainly has problems—attempts to educate and celebrate differences often wind up with a good portion of "minority" students pigeonholed and "non-minority" students apathetic—Elliott does not provide a better alternative. His alternative is that we "study not just what some of these societies do right, but what they do wrong," but he doesn't provide an objective standard to do this. He implies that American culture is better than "an Arabic culture" because it doesn't give rise to terrorists. Apparently Elliott has never heard of Ted Kaczinsky or Timothy McVeigh. He might argue that they don't represent American culturo or Americans on the whole. I'd argue that Taliban members don't represent the culture of their societies either.

Culture doesn't drive people to become terrorists because culture is far too complex and constituted by the influence of other cultures over such long periods of time for one to ascribe such a simplistic, reified and mechanistic nature to either. If anything drives someone to terrorism, it is a jingoistic, polarized conception of the world as Elliott seems to hold. Only by constructing the fictitious boundaries between cultures can you begin to believe one culture superior, whether technologically, economically, morally or religiously. Perhaps Elliott would prefer to disregard the existence of "non-Western" civilizations (for example, the "cradle of civilization" located in modern-day Iraq) that have influenced our own so much?

I'd like to know what surah in the Quran Elliott refers to when claiming that the Taliban is indicative of "an Islamic society." He'd also be shocked to find out how apathetic most Americans were to the plight of the Jews before and during World War II. Elliott's examples, essentially, smack of nothing more than a comic-book understanding of history and culture.

Sincerely,

Joseph Trullinger '03

The case for accessible stem cell research

By Erin Switzer
Staff Writer

It really is quite striking how much controversy has arisen over a clump of cells. Stem cells are obtained from blastocysts, or 5-day-old embryos leftover in fertility clinics. Many condemn the use of stem cells because their extraction requires the "death" of a human embryo. But these outcries of immorality only indicate the powerful brainwashing effects of religion on society, and an outright lack of concern for others.

Scientists researching stem cells someday hope to learn how to manipulate them to replace tissues and organs damaged by disease or injury. Stem cells' importance centers around their ability to become cells in the brain, heart, bones, muscles and skin in an unlimited quantity. Furthermore, they have the potential to treat Alzheimer's; stroke; heart attack; multiple sclerosis; blood, bone and bone marrow ailments; severe burns; spinal cord injuries; and cancer patients who have lost cells and tissue to radiation and chemotherapy. They might also be used to treat some genetic defects and possibly to repair a damaged brain before birth.

It is infuriating that people are so willing to forsake tremendous health benefits, using closed-minded religious babble to defend their stance on this issue. How can we consider a petri dish of cells to be human in the first place? They do not have their own ideas, thoughts, emotions, desires or intelligence that we would all consider essential distinguishing components of humans. Opponents of embryonic stem cell research seem to be more committed to protecting 5-day-old cells than the rights of millions of people who suffer the pain of debilitating illnesses.

Since August 2001 when Bush limited federal funding to pre-existing stem cell lines in fertility clinics, scientists have had difficulties obtaining them. According to The New York Times, frustrated researchers who have countless potential treatments for diseases at their fingertips to test have had to wait for the cells to fully develop and "must go through painstaking negotiations to persuade the companies and universities that own the lines to share them." The problem lies in that there are just 78 self-sustaining cell colonies available.

It is entirely unethical to allow the government to control how stem cells can be used when they are a product of two human beings.

It is unethical to allow the government to control how stem cells can be used when they are a product of two human beings. The rights of the individuals involved in creating the cells should not be ignored to please others with opposing opinions. The creators of the embryos should be able to donate them for whatever cause they feel appropriate.

I recently picked up a copy of The Wall Street Journal and discovered two articles. The headline of the first, "Doctors use teen's stem cells in procedure to repair his heart" reported the story of a 16-year-old who was shot in the heart with a nail gun and treated using his own stem cells. Although this miraculous feat shows the progress associated with adult stem cells, it is apparent that there are inherent limitations to their uses. There are uncertainties of how the adult cells, cells taken from a person's own blood stream or bone marrow, will interact once inside the body. Bush, along with conservatives in Congress, argues for the use of adult stem cells as a more ethical alternative to embryonic stem cells, claiming that they can still advance medical care. This argument has proven to be unsubstantiated as evidenced by Dr. Robert Lanza, medical director of Advanced Cell Technology to MSNBC, who said, "The [adult stem] cells have limited clinical potential as they are going to be very difficult-if not impossible-to grow in high enough quantities to be of therapeutic value."

It struck me as odd that further down the page was a caption leading to an article with a headline that read, "Finding a cheaper way to make a baby....In vitro fertilization is offered without drugs to lower costs." The article discussed how in vitro fertilization (IVF) is becoming cheaper. While making IVF more affordable to people is commendable, I find it difficult to stomach that this procedure, once opposed, is now considered a miracle, being made available to more people, while the research of embryonic stem cells is still strongly contested.

During in vitro fertilization, we risk the "death" of the embryo. The fact that this procedure is not met with the same amount of criticism as that of embryonic stem cells reeks of hypocrisy since each situation involves the termination of cell processes, one in the woman's body, and the other on the lab table.

With Bush's policy in place, embryonic stem cell research has moved at an extremely sluggish pace because of tight restrictions on funding. His policy seems inadequate when we consider that it is legal to use embryonic stem cell lines extracted before August but not after.

More federally funded research should be supported because the goal of researchers and scientists is not to exploit the cloning process, but to use these additional embryos to accelerate the lagging U.S. research on the few embryos that still exist. The future for embryonic stem cells is bleak. Although privately funded scientists are not limited in their research, they acknowledge that federal funds are an essential component in the research that tends to be the first step toward any kind of medical breakthrough. Advances in government-funded research will be halted in its tracks when the supply of cell lines run out.

We can only wait for the time when those in power finally realize what miracles stem cells can bring to our society. Until then, millions of Americans will struggle with the idea that improvements in the quality of their lives rest on the research of the remaining 78 federally funded lines of stem cells.

The unseen battle of the laundry room

By Jordy Leiser
Writer

Intense competition. Ruthless opposition. Strategic timing. Monetary stakes. Determination, hard work,and patience. You probably associate these words with the glorious Stanley Cup Playoffs or the military efforts in Iraq. I, on the other hand, think of only one thing when I see those words ... laundry.

The laundry situation in my dorm is the following: If you want to do your laundry at any remotely convenient time of the day, forget about it! There are 6 dryers stacked against 4 washing machines. Common sense would tell you that whenever your clothes are clean, there should always be an available dryer there for you. You could not be more wrong. Two of the dryers aren't even functional and show no signs of life. Two of the dryers are purely spinning machines. Your clothes circulate, round and round and upside down, but no heat is applied. You don't have to be a General Electric Mobile Technician to know that heat is a key element to the drying process. Your clothes come out of said dryers cold, wet, and everything but dry.

Finally, there are two working dryers that dry the living hell out of your clothes. 80 minutes, thermonuclear heat and hasty spinning gets the job done. But, I'm an economics major, I know that demand for a good dryer is increased in my dorm, and an all out brawl for a good dryer will ensue.

After 26 minutes of a thorough cleansing and washing cycle, I find more grass and dirt on my pants than when I originally put my clothes in the washer. These findings are, of course, dependent upon me being able to bypass the flash flood created by starting the machines in the first place.

Attempting to do laundry correctly, completely and efficiently, I decided to hit up the laundry room at 1p.m. last Wednesday. Needless to say, it was a religious experience. I kid you not. It was peaceful, quiet, relaxing and, well ... so money. I started my routine, which is probably flawed beyond belief, and a campus tour passed by. I quickly started putting clothes in piles according to color and did everything I thought I was supposed to do to efficiently do the laundry. Walking passed the laundry room, one of the mothers probably made a snide comment about how I was an idiot because I washing my blue shorts with my yellow shirt on the "permanent press" setting, ruining all my clothes.

Regardless, I preceded to the do the usual two months worth of laundry overflowing three of the four washers. Because I'm cheap and one of the other good dryers was already in use, when my clothes were clean, I decided—as I'm sure many others do as well—to put all of my clothes in one dryer. I threw in my quarters and watched that beautiful dryer do its magic. It is so rare for me to actually get one of the functioning dryers that I literally stood there for at least 20 seconds staring at my entire wardrobe free itself from its stench.

I went back to my room and set an alarm to remind myself to take the clothes out of the dryer because we all know what happens if you don't: You go to dinner, meet up with some friends, decide to go chill at your buddies place and next thing you know, it's 11a.m. the next morning. Of course, it's standard procedure for those waiting in line for the dryer to throw all of your clean clothes on the floor, on top of the washer, out the window or in the small opening of the vending machine. Anyway, I returned to get my clothes and they were, you guessed it, nowhere close to being dry.

I'm too lazy to dry all my clothes again, so I just belted out a few obscenities at the dryer and threw every damp item in my laundry bag. My next task ws to make it up three flights of stairs with enough laundry to fully clothe a small Icelandic village and my greatest challenge thus far as a college student was to avoid pulling my groin or dislodging a lumbar disk. In my room, I was so distressed that I unloaded all my damp clothes on my bed and didn't remove them for 48 hours, sleeping two nights on top of damp, clean clothes. Luckily, every blind squirrel finds an acorn sometimes, and I found one dry shirt, still steaming hot and put it on.

The activity of doing laundry is becoming increasingly problematic and stressful on the mind and body, and I would not be surprised to see more students going downstairs to complete their mission, Operation Guaranteed Failure!

This is what a feminist writes like

By Aaron Hanlon
Senior Writer

Apparently the fact that I'm a politically conservative, pro-life male with moral convictions mandates that I can't be a feminist. If the name of the game is to modify society such that women and men have equal rights under law and equal opportunities; such that sexual harassment and sexual violence become things of the past; such that the patriarchal aspects of culture are neutralized to the extent that women and men are, barring natural, biological differences, the same, some will say that people like me don't qualify to fight for the good guys—I mean—good people. Complain all you want, but I think the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League (NARRAL) and the National Organization for Women are often malignant, Jerry Falwell knows what he's talking about when it comes to abortion, Phyllis Schlafly is smarter than Gloria Steinem, and I'm still a feminist! I may or may not be the kind of feminist you like, but it's going to take a collaborative effort to inspire change.

Just like the obnoxious cliché, "There's more than one way to skin a (insert defenseless animal here)," sorry PETA, we could theoretically achieve the general goals of feminism via different avenues and feminist theories. Naturally, those who subscribe to a particular theory will believe that their theory is the best solution to their problems. But even the best of theories is pragmatically worthless without popular support. This is, in my view, one of the crises of the collective feminist movement: The reality of our situation is that we have a vast array of feminist theories—none of which would or should entirely yield to others—and few of which seem willing to embrace general feminist goals as a cause greater than theory in a practical effort gain the popular support needed to achieve these goals. Instead of clamoring about who's not a feminist, we should be embracing different feminists and feminist theories so long as they are aimed at our general goals of dismantling patriarchy and creating equal opportunity for all. If men have been dominating the world all this time in spite of female resistance, isn't it going to take men working alongside women to make change? If conservatives are the majority in Congress at least half of the time, isn't it going to take conservatives to make change? If there are millions of women throughout the world who feel alienated by aggressively anti-life abortion activists and predominant "women's issue" groups like NARRAL and Planned Parenthood, isn't it going to take pro-lifers to make change? None of these groups should be excluded from feminism as a cause because they have valuable insights into how we can achieve our feminist goals.

Being a conservative male does not mean being a chauvinist or an elitist. I want women to feel safe walking through the streets. I want catcallers to stop. I want my eventual daughter to be treated with respect, play sports if she wants and get paid what she deserves when she gets a job. And if she wants to play with dolls (the realistically-proportional kind), that's fine too. Neo-conservatives are not the same cigar-smoking, sexist robber-baron types depicted in anti-smoking commercials and Economics 103 movies. We believe in equal opportunity, human rights, civility and personal responsibility. These are virtues that many feminist theorists embrace. Being a conservative these days is not anti-woman. These causes are certainly feminist issues, and they certainly can be furthered by any human being, regardless of what kind of sex chromosomes that human being has or what his or her political affiliation may be. To exclude males and conservatives from fighting for these causes is imprudent.

Likewise, pro-lifers can be feminists too. True choice, true reproductive freedom lies in the decision-making process before sex, not after. Lifting the societal pressures and societal sexualizing of women is a step in the right direction. Helping couples realize that sex has risks and consequences is essential. Though I cannot speak from experience, I would imagine that abortion is not an attractive procedure to women who actually have abortions. Standing up for a woman's right to choose what she wants and what her life can accommodate before having sex is an important contribution to feminist thought that is overlooked by the anti-life crowd and simultaneously reinforced by the pro-life movement. These are important thoughts that should not be excluded from the feminist movement simply because they are borne out of a pro-life agenda.

There are different kinds of feminists, often with surprisingly common goals. Reaching out to all kinds in an effort to create a popular movement would allow a far more realistic chance of inspiring change. Though this might require some sacrifice of theoretical principles, reality dictates that there must be a pragmatic solution to our problems. We ought to promote a more inclusive notion of feminism for the good of the movement, rather than bicker about who's in and who's out.

Our new dean should be welcomed

To the Editor:

I am saddened to find that some students on campus do not value the appointment of a new dean for diversity.

I find the points of contact between races and cultures to be complex and delicate ground, requiring a great deal of compassion and understanding in order to navigate them. It is invaluable to our University to have a dean who is dedicated to making opportunities for cultural education and interaction to happen on campus. Senior Tom Elliott's choice of words to describe multiculturalism, such as "simplistic" and "intellectually lazy," are offensive and far from reality. I found the ideas expressed in his article to be insensitive and provoking, not only to minority students at the University, but to everyone who has experienced the gifts that diversity offers.

It is invaluable to our University to have a dean who is dedicated to making opportunities for cultural education and interaction to happen on campus.

As a white American, I feel it is important that we take off our blinders and realize the privileges and disadvantages that come with skin color ... realize that we live in a culture—in a world—in which Western civilization is placed on a high pedestal. Where Elliott said we need to study what some societies do wrong, I propose that we start with ourselves. Not because America is "guilty" and all others "innocent," but because we live in a world where injustice is an epidemic to which no culture or society is immune. One of the major ways we participate in this injustice is simply by allowing ourselves to become complacent and affording ourselves the "luxury" of forgetting that there is a whole world outside these borders.

It is clear that Elliott does not place a value on multiculturalism, and all I can say is, "You are the one who is missing out." In my four years here, my most profound learning has occurred outside of the classroom and in the presence of students who are different than I am. It is in learning about other cultures that I have in turn come to understand my own, and I consider my life all the richer for it. I celebrate the bit of diversity we do have here. I want to see it grow in breadth and depth in the coming years.

I am grateful for our new dean, and I welcome her presence on this campus.

Sincerely,

President Rogers supports student groups

To the Editor:

I just wanted to say that I have been impressed lately with how much support University President Steffen Rogers and his wife, Athena, have been showing for students.

Just this past weekend, I saw both of them at The Silhouettes CD release concert, Admissions Fair and Gospel Choir concert. Both of them also made it a priority to attend and speak to congress at the BSG meeting Sunday.

I know that being president of a university requires a great deal of balancing to manage the various constituencies, including the administration, faculty, students and trustees. And I think last weekend President Rogers definitely illustrated that students are a priority by spending so much of his time enjoying multiple aspects of student life.

Sincerely,

Katy Timer '04

More information from Zeta Phi Beta

To the Editor:

The ladies of Zeta Phi Beta Sorority, Inc. Nu Sigma Zeta Chapter in Harrisburg, Pa., received a copy of the article written regarding the undergraduate chapter of Gamma Iota and the sorority. First let me state that the sorority is very honored to be featured in your newspaper. As the sponsoring graduate chapter, we are thrilled that the Gamma Iota chapter is being reactivated on your campus.

I would like to state there was quite a bit of information in your article that was incorrect regarding the newly reactivated chapter. I understand that the University is very interested in learning about Zeta Phi Beta Sorority, Inc. and we would gladly provide you with accurate information and answer any questions that you may have. Since only members of Zeta Phi Beta Sorority, Inc. have the authority to speak on its behalf and the Gamma Iota chapter currently has no members, please forward any correspondence regarding Zeta Phi Beta Sorority Inc. to Nu Sigma Zeta Chapter President Evelyn Akers. Her information is:

Evelyn Akers

Harrisburg, PA 17103
(717) 236-3143

The Gamma Iota chapter has no members or officers, as of yet, therefore, Jakita Price '04 cannot be the president. The article also stated that she was one of the four founders—since this is a reactivation process there are no founders. The founders of Gamma Iota chapter were the original members.

Since the membership intake process has not begun, this statement is also inaccurate: "There are officially no members of the upstart sorority besides the four members because the Membership Intake process has not ended yet, so it has not produced any members of the sorority." For the record, the Membership Intake process has not began at Bucknell yet and there are no members!

Thank you for your time and I look forward to hearing from you.

2003 Commencement choice disappoints

To the Editor:

The prestige of a university is often measured by the type of the speaker which it draws to graduation. Despite the efforts of the University to associate itself with an Ivy League image, it is fitting that in a time when so many of our graduating seniors are struggling to find jobs, we should reveal our true colors. The University, apparently, is the Deborah Norville of institutions of higher learning. It is not Norville's fault that she was chosen to represent this year's graduating seniors. I hope that we can respect her as she delivers what will certainly be a well-prepared speech. I do not doubt that she can be eloquent and perhaps even profound—given two months notice, anyone could be. But the fact of the matter is, the choice of a commencement speaker is an opportunity for a university to make a symbolic connection with someone in the outside world whose values and qualities match its own.

For Colgate, that person is a Pulitzer Prize winning journalist. For Franklin and Marshall it is the current governor of Pennsylvania. Ursinus and Muhlenburg colleges have the Queen of Jordan and a Pennsylvania senator, respectively. Washington University in St. Louis and Bucknell are supposedly rivals in prestige according to the administration, but does Norville's reputation match that of Madeline Albright, Washington's choice? For some, the commencement speaker puts a stamp of approval on their college degree. "Not only have I earned my diploma," you might say, "but I have earned it from a school that is respected even in the eyes of [inset name here]." For the class of 2003, that name is Deborah Norville, award-winning tabloid news anchor.

Sincerely,

SARS epidemic paralyzes Asian industries

As the WHO races to find a treatment for SARS, many businesses show symptoms of a economic strain

Courtesy of Reuters

Travelers arrive at Hong Kong International Airport during peak hours. Due to the rapid spread of SARS, the World Health Organization has warned travelers of the risks associated with traveling to southern China and Hong Kong, which has especially hurt the transportation industry.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

There are many drags on business today—the conflict in Iraq, economic trouble in the United States, unrest on the Korean peninsula. The biggest problem may be something we cannot see: Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS).

The SARS epidemic began in Beijing on March 1, about a month before China made the announcement to the world, according to BBC News. The World Health Organization continues to criticize the Chinese government for not warning the world earlier.

Chinese Prime Minister Wen Jiabao said on Monday, "China must insist on stating the facts about the latest developments regarding the outbreak."

According to BBC, Wen went further with his warning. He said that China must responsibly detect additional cases and quarantine those affected. Transport terminals have to be more vigilant. Wen also said that the Chinese economy and the nation's image and society might suffer as well. Many events in China have been canceled and companies around the world are finding other places to do business.

Two of the biggest industries seeing widespread effects from the virus are the airlines and technology companies that have a presence in the Pacific Rim. American airlines are rethinking their strategy in flying to the region and Asian airlines are seeing their business evaporate. Computer companies are seeing consumer purchases increase while their own business practices are changing.

Cathay Pacific, a carrier based in Hong Kong, is fighting off rumors that it will temporarily cease operations.

According to CNN.com, Tony Tyler, the airline's director of corporate development, said, "There are absolutely no plans for Cathay Pacific to ground the passenger fleet. All the memo intended to do was to communicate to a very important segment of the work force—the air crew, the pilots—that times are difficult at the moment."

CNN said that the airline was responding to a leaked internal memo that spoke of the dramatic drop in passenger numbers expected for May. They feel that numbers could be as few as 6,000 per day, which could force the airline to cut flights or even shut down.

"The Association of Flight Attendants has called on the Federal Aviation Administration to require airlines to make masks and gloves available on all flights to and from Asia and within Asia," The New York Times reported.

Airline cleaning is also taking on a more important role. The New York Times reported that United Airlines gives its planes a cleaning every night and a more thorough cleaning every 15 days. Southwest deep cleans its jets every 28 days with the bathrooms getting a cleaning every 21 days.

Aircraft cleanliness is also causing manufacturers to do things they never have before. According to The New York Times, Boeing is recommending to its customers a cleaner called EcoTru. The substance does not damage metal or plastic and is not dangerous to inhale. Airlines are not required to follow the suggestions of Boeing, but, according to the company's spokesperson, many are.

The computer industry is also changing. Telecommuting is bringing many consumers to electronic stores in East Asia, The New York Times reported. "In Hong Kong, companies and consumers have bought every desktop, laptop and notebook computer they can find as more and more people work from home—often with their employers' encouragement—for fear of becoming infected if they come to work...Some executives are nervous about how they will manage if the disease continues to spread in the region, which dominates global production of computers and other electronic goods."

The New York Times reported that some companies, including Taiwan's largest computer chip manufacturer, Taiwan Semiconductor, are telling engineers and employees only working in China to remain there and not return home. Some, like Mitsubishi and Sanyo, are even offering to fly families home while the worker remains behind. Still others like Matsushita and Toshiba have had no problems.

Much of this stems from an incident in Singapore where "authorities quarantined 305 Motorola workers last week when a single worker fell ill on the night shift in one of its factories. The company ended up suspending production for one night and then increasing output during morning and afternoon shifts to meet demand," according to The New York Times.

The good news is the recent discovery of the virus which causes SARS and a hint on how to treat it. The Washington Post reported Thursday, "Dutch scientists have produced the final pieces of evidence needed to conclusively link the microbe, known as a coronavirus, to SARS." This will allow scientists and doctors to treat the epidemic more effectively. Business will remain under distress until signs that the outbreak is under control around the world.

Palestinian cabinet criticized

By Emma Post
Staff Writer

On April 14, new Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas and Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat struggled over Abbas' proposed ministers for a new government. Members who felt insulted by the new government, as well as other discontented politicians, also attacked Abbas, Arafat's second in command. There is a long-standing struggle in Palestine between the people's ability to speak up and Arafat's power.

Senior Palestinian officials hope that the new government will be approved by April 18, The New York Times reported. Some Palestinians are worrying that Abbas might resign as a result of the criticism he has received. Arafat also has the power to fire Abbas if he feels it is necessary.

The new list for the Palestinian Cabinet contains no women. The widow of Abu Jihad, Arafat's former prime minister, is discontent with this fact. Jihad's widow had been minister of social welfare and has not yet been replaced.

Instead of a new, fresh list of people, many of Arafat's old guard is on the list. According to The New York Times, Hasan Khraisheh, an independent legislator, feels "this is a government of security, to arrest people." The new government would ideally create jobs and ease poverty.

Abbas, who has worked closely with Arafat for decades, is a top Palestinian negotiator. He does not have strong public support and has made no attempt to change that since being appointed prime minister a month ago. He spent over three weeks determining his Cabinet in secret. Once these choices were made public Sunday, many of his allies were offended because they were not previously informed of his assignments.

Other politicians found that their delegations or duties had been lessened. Saeb Erekat, an ally of Arafat, is currently the local affairs minister, but is slated to become a minister without portfolio, or just a "minister of state." This generic, unimportant label angered Erekat. "In fact, The New York Times reported that Erekat said he would "rather not" be a member of Abbas' government.

Polls issued on April 15 by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research surprisingly found that 61 percent of Palestinians supported Abbas. But, only 43 percent thought that Abbas could construct a Cabinet that would make the public happy.

According to The New York Times, Director of the Palestinian Center Dr. Khalil Shikaki said, "The public has a tough time being convinced that he [Abbas] will be able to reform the political system or control the security situation."

U.S. President George W. Bush and Dov Weisglass, an aid to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, were simultaneously working in Washington, D.C., to amend a new peace plan, known as the road map, between Israelis and Palestinians. The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations are proposing this "road map" in order to "impose a plan of action on the two sides that would reduce Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians while moving towards creation of a Palestinian state," reported The Washington Post. Bush will only announce the new peace plan once the new government in Palestine is confirmed.

Many of the members of the Palestinian government are part of the Fatah movement under Arafat, which seeks to preserve Palestine and protect it. Fatah, of which Abbas was a founder, believes that it deserves Jerusalem and hesitates to surrender or negotiate their position.

U.S. warns Syria against harboring Iraqi leaders

By Kyle Schoeneman
Writer

The war in Iraq has prompted the Bush administration to look suspiciously at other similarly governed countries. In the future, the U.S. military may target any nation that supports terrorism or develops weapons of mass destruction. There have been recent reports that Syria has been harboring leaders from Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's fallen regime. Evidence of this lies in the arrest of Hussein's half-brother, Watban Ibrahim Hasan al-Tikriti, who was caught this past weekend trying to cross the Syrian border.

U.S. Press Secretary Ari Fleischer made a statement scolding Syria on April 14.

According to The New York Times, Fleischer said, "Syria is a nation that has long been on the list of terrorist nations. They should not do that, they should not be that way; no nation should be."

In his statement he also said Syria is a "rogue nation."

According to The Washington Post, Fleischer also read a CIA report at his news briefing. The report was sent to Congress last year and claims that Syria has stockpiles of the nerve agent sarin. The report also said the nation is attempting to produce more toxic materials, such as biological agents. Fleischer also said that Syria never signed the treaty banning chemical weapons.

At the news briefing, Fleischer was asked if his remarks about Syria could evolve into military action. He did not speculate on the possibility of his remarks being a threat.

According to The New York Times, Fleischer said, "I think that what's next is Syria needs to seriously ponder the implications of their actions in terms of harboring Iraqis who need not and should not be harbored. They should think seriously about their program to develop and to have chemical weapons. I think it's time to think through where they want their place to be in the world."

Fleischer suggested the country exile Hezbollah, a terrorist group that is one of Israel's principle enemies. Fleischer's statement is not the first stern warning to Syria issued by the United States. U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and U.S. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld have also made remarks about Syria.

During his address, Fleischer took on a lecturing tone toward Syria. He advised the country to take its place among law-abiding nations.

According to CNN, Fleischer said, "It is time for Syria to understand. This is a day of emerging liberation for the people of Iraq, and it's important for President Assad of Syria, who is a new leader, a young man, to understand that the future needs to be different from the past and that the Iraqi people deserve no less; the region deserves no less."

According to The Washington Post, Syrian officials denied the charges made against them. The Syrian ambassador, Imad Moustapha, called the accusations "a campaign of misinformation and disinformation" used to distract from the "human catastrophes" taking place in Iraq. According to CNN, Syrian Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Bouthaina Shaaban denied the accusation that Syria was giving refuge to officials of the collapsed Iraqi regime.

"Nobody would even ask to come to us, because there is no good relation at all between Iraq and Syria," Shaaban said.

She also denied the development of any chemical weapons. According to The Washington Post, Shaaban told Reuters, "We say to him [Bush] that Syria has no chemical weapons and that the only chemical, biological and nuclear weapons in the region are in Israel, which is threatening its neighbors and occupying their land."

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said that Washington and London have no plans to invade Syria. According to The New York Times, Straw said that there are "important questions" that need to be answered about the Syrian weapons program.

> "It is time for Syria to understand. This is a day of emerging liberation for the people of Iraq, and it's important for President Assad of Syria, who is a new leader, a young man, to understand that the future needs to be different from the past and that the Iraqi people deserve no less; the region deserves no less."

Track records fall as the temperature rises

By Evan Honeyfield
Senior Writer

Perfect conditions over the weekend allowed the University to host one of the best track invitationals that Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium has held in years. The University took advantage of the competition and the excellent weather at the Bucknell Outdoor Classic to make many breakthroughs in distance and time.

Friday night's distance carnival under the lights lived up to its billing as three track records fell and a host of Bison scored wins and personal bests. The action early saw American University runner Shane LeBeau set a 5,000-meter run track record, pulling Stephen Schaefer '04 and Doug Creveling '05 to personal bests by over 30 seconds each. Samia Akbar, also of American, set the women's 5,000 track record 30 minutes later.

Not to be outdone, Dan Lounsbury '05 set the track record in the 10,000-meter (30 minutes, 45 seconds), qualifying for the IC4A meet a short while later. Shawn Algiers of St. Francis University paced Lounsbury through 6,400 meters, leaving Lounsbury alone for the last 3,600 meters, resulting in a 2:41 personal best.

"There is a point in every race where you just need to forget everything, splits or pain, and just race all out," Lounsbury said. "That's what I did those last two miles, and with the support of the entire stadium, I pulled through with a great time. This meet was the best overall team performance this season so far. I was excited to see our middistance and distance runners perform up to their potential."

The women's 10,000-meter race was considerably closer, with a lead pack of three together until the last 25 meters. Coming down the homestretch, Katie Pfeifer '05 pulled out the win.

"I was very pleased with my performance," Pfeifer said. "I was able to stay on pace and to keep my momentum going."

Head Coach Kevin Donner was very happy with the distance races.

"Pfeifer ran a great 10k to make the all-time top 10 list and Dan Lounsbury has put himself at a new level. He has a lot of confidence right now and is very hungry to continue training hard," Donner said.

Saturday's events gave Donner even more reasons to be happy. Noel Powell '04 continued his dominance by winning the 200-meter dash (21.34) and placing second in a very competitive 100-meter dash (10.64).

In the 200, Powell, who tends to come out of the blocks rather slowly, ran with the field around the corner. Coming down the straightaway, Powell put a huge gap between himself and the competition for the impressive win.

The men's 800-meter run turned into one of the most exciting races of the day as Eric Furst '03 made the top 10 list, finishing third. Through the 400 meters, which went in 57 seconds, Furst was in the middle of a 12-man field.

In the final 200 meters, Furst made a strong move that pushed him to his final time of 1:53, a half second behind the winner and a half second in front of teammates Aaron Hanlon '04 and Lou Palma '03.

The Bison hurdlers also had big days all around as Kiley MacDonald '05 won both the women's 100-meter hurdles and 400-meter hurdles, and Mike Mellas '05 set a personal best in the men's 400-meter hurdles.

"I was very happy with all our hurdlers," Donner said.

Along with the wins, Donner

Bison take three of four from Lehigh to strengthen their lead

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

The Bucknell baseball team continued its reign over the Patriot League last weekend, taking three games of a four-game series against Lehigh. The wins increased the Bison's league record to 9-3 and to 17-8 overall. The 9-3 mark gives the Bison a comfortable three-game lead over second-place Navy's 6-4 mark.

The Orange and Blue split a doubleheader at Lehigh on April 12, winning 3-1 and losing 0-4. The Bison swept the Mountainhawks in a doubleheader on April 13 with 1-0 and 6-3 victories. The first game on Sunday saw Phil Futrick '06 break the school record for saves in a single season as he earned his eighth save in the shutout.

The series was an excellent finale to the team's Patriot League success on the road all year and also gave the Bison a bit of revenge.

"The key for any championship-caliber team is being able to win on the road," Kevins Burns '03 said. "This year so far, all 12 league contests have been on the road, and we have had great success. Beating Lehigh three out of four times was payback for what they did to us last year on our field in the post-game celebration."

The three wins also have the team looking ahead to postseason hopes.

"We have put ourselves in a terrific position to make the postseason, and possibly host the tournament," Assistant Coach Rick Ciccione said.

The team kicked off the weekend with a strong win over the Mountainhawks on Saturday. The Bison started the scoring in the third inning, when Phil Bunting '05 singled, advanced to second on a Steve Stutzman '04 sacrifice and scored on a Ben Stoll '04 single.

Lehigh managed to get on the scoreboard with a tying run in the fourth, but the Bison jumped back on top with a two-run sixth inning. Crafty baserunning helped the Bison once again, as Stoll, who had reached second on an error, and Sam Moss '04, who had reached first on a walk, executed a double-steal. With runners on second and third, Brian Day '05 singled to knock in a run and give the Bison a 2-1 lead. Moss then scored as Brian Hirschberg '04 reached on a fielder's choice to pad the score at 3-1.

Futrick finished off the Mountainhawks to earn his seventh save of the year. He pitched a one-two-three inning, striking out the final two batters.

Kevin Miller '04 outdueled three-time Patriot League Pitcher of the Week Jack Muscalis to earn the win and improve his team-best record to 5-0. He pitched six innings, allowing just one run on four hits while striking out five. He continues to lead the team in strikeouts, fanning 31 batters on the season.

The duo led off a weekend that was once again headlined by strong Bison pitching.

"The Lehigh series was another example of outstanding pitching performances," Head Coach Gene Depew said.

Ciccione agreed that the pitching was paramount.

"Our pitching was masterful once again in shutting down a potent Lehigh offense," Ciccione said. "I can't say enough about the competitiveness of our pitching, which has come through time and again in close games. While we didn't get the bats going until game four, our pitching was able to hold down the fort until the offense came through."

In the second game of the day, the Bison offense was shut out for the first time this season, losing 0-4 to Lehigh. The Orange and Blue could only manage two hits all afternoon and, aside from one prolific fourth inning, Lehigh's bats were equally lethargic.

Starting pitcher R.J. Grant '03 struggled in the fourth inning, but was effective throughout the rest of the game. He took the loss, pitching all six innings and allowing six hits and four earned runs. Four of the hits and all of the runs came in the one rough inning, while Grant held Lehigh scoreless through the rest of his outing.

Women's tennis dominates, men falter

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bison women's tennis team improved to 14-3 after beating Division II perennial powerhouse Bloomsburg 6-1 at home. Earlier in the week the Bison beat Villanova 6-1, Vermont 5-2 and dropped a close match to Binghampton 4-3. The men's team has suffered four competitive losses in a row to Binghampton 5-2, Colgate 5-2, Lehigh 4-3 and Bloomsburg 6-1.

The women bounced back from their loss to Binghampton and won all but one singles match en route to a 6-1 drubbing of Bloomsburg. Tanya Sichko '05 teamed up with Jill Wurzburg '03 to win the first doubles match 8-3, and Rheanna Gaskin '06 joined Sam Berthod '03 to secure the doubles point.

"We expected to win coming into this match," Berthod said. "But we played tough and pulled through."

The Bison have viewed their last four non-league matches as preparation for their upcoming Patriot League play when they will face off against Army and American this coming weekend.

"Bloomsburg was a big match to win," Berthod said. "We needed all the practice we could get before Patriots and that is how we looked at this one."

The Bison were coming off a three-match road trip prior to the Bloomsburg match, beginning with a win over Villanova 6-1. The Herd took the doubles point and five of six singles against the Wildcats with all of their wins completed in just two sets.

"We knew we would have to play well to beat Villanova," Helt said. "And we played outstanding across the board."

The Bison would be without Wurzburg, who normally plays at the No. 3 flight for the next two matches against Vermont and Binghampton. The team was able to

Women's water polo places fifth overall in tournament

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bison women's water polo team dropped its first game of Southern Championships at Kinney Natatorium against rival George Washington 9-7, but won three straight games to finish fifth overall in the tournament. By beating Villanova 9-8 in overtime in the final game, the Bison earned a 10th seed in Eastern's next weekend to be held in Boston.

The opening game against George Washington proved to be as close as the Bison had expected it to be coming into the game. The two teams had split their games in the regular season with the Bison taking the first by one goal and losing the second by one.

This time George Washington got off to a good early start, holding a 4-2 lead at halftime. The Bison fought hard and managed to battle back in the third quarter as Kaitiln Bardoe '06 received a pass from Katie Stahler '03 and put one in over the goalie's head to bring them within one. Stahler then backhanded in a pass from Cody Keffer '05 to tie the score at four and give the Bison the momentum.

The Herd gained the lead when Eileen Ketterer '05 scored with 5:10 remaining in the third period and the Bison clung to a 7-6 advantage at the end of three. But the fourth quarter was all George Washington, as they outscored the Bison 3-0 to take the win 9-7.

"We felt like this was our time to beat them," Head Coach John Zeigler said. "It was disappointing to have been up by one after coming back and then to let it slip away."

The loss ruined the Bison's chances of finishing in the top 4 of the tournament, which would have guaranteed the team placement in Eastern's, one of the team's goals all season. Nevertheless the Bison maintained a positive attitude, knowing that by winning their remaining games they could capture an at-large bid to the tournament.

"The George Washington loss was tough because we felt like we could've won in our home pool," Keffer said. "But we knew we had played a good game so we didn't get down and picked it up and played solid for our last three."

The Bison came out with a vengeance against their next opponent, Washington and Jefferson, jumping out to a 7-0 lead after the first quarter and never looking back, going on to win 19-3. Meg Blitzer '05 scored a season-high four goals in the contest and Ketterer added three of her own, while Bardoe tallied one goal and an assist.

"We knew we had worked hard in the loss against George Washington and we just wanted to go out there and work even harder," Bardoe said. "We used the loss as motivation."

Slippery Rock, the next Bison opponent, also fell victim to the Bison's rampage, losing 14-3. The Bison held a 3-1 lead with three minutes remaining in the first quarter before turning it on and rattling off the next eight goals of the contest including a 5-0 second quarter effort.

"Slippery Rock is a pretty good team," Zeigler said. "But we played very aggressively and didn't give them a chance to gain momentum. We controlled that one for all four quarters."

The two commanding wins set up the game for fifth place in the tournament between the Bison and Villanova. The Bison got the best of

Cycling team heads to Nationals

By Brent Butler
Sports Editor

The Bison community has always had many strong club teams that have stood out for the University as exemplary organizations. Over the weekend the men's cycling team proved it is one of these organizations at the Army Spring Classic by capturing third in the team time trial and accumulating enough points throughout the season to go to Nationals.

The cycling team has been a part of the University community since the early 1990s. The team's popularity, along with its roster size, has waned and expanded depending on the level of commitment of the cyclists each year.

This year, behind captain Ben Turits '03, the five-man cycling team has proven a very competitive team throughout the East Coast.

"We have been racing since the first weekend in March every weekend, picking up points here and there. Finally, last week at the Army Spring Classic we picked up a third-place finish in the time trial, which gained us enough points to reach Nationals," Turits said.

All five members—Kyle Lobisser '06, Brad Schaeffer '03, Adam Swank '05, Rich Swanson '04 and Turtis—performed well at the Army Spring Classic, but it was the third-place finish in the team time trial that placed the team in contention for Nationals next month.

In the team time trial each team begins the race with four racers, and throughout the course of the 12.8-mile race, the racers work as a team to maneuver through the competition and try to get three of the four to the front of the pack. Turtis crossed the line first, followed shortly by Schaeffer and Swanson with a final time of 32 minutes, 22 seconds. As soon as Swanson's front tire crossed the finish line the clock stopped and the Bison amassed enough points to head to Nationals.

Turits has picked up many top 10 finishes throughout the season. On March 8, Turits placed second at the Penn State road race in Redding, Pa.

Compared to a lot of other teams, the Bison squad is fairly inexperienced in the cycling field. Turtis was 14 when he first began biking competitively.

"I'd always been an endurance runner and wanted to continue in an endurance sport," Turits said. "Cycling was something different that no one else was doing. After the sponsorships started coming in and paying for my gear, it basically became a free sport that was a lot of fun."

As the only first-year student on the squad and a newcomer to the sport in general, Lobisser has done extremely well throughout the season. Lobisser originally intended to play baseball for the Bison, but after a painful arm injury he was forced to the sidelines. Lobisser saw the cycling team practicing and felt it would be a great way to continue with a sport.

"I'm definitely continuing with cycling for my years at Bucknell," Lobbisser said.

Next week the cycling team travels to the University of New Hampshire to compete in the Eastern Collegiate Championships.

"We really want to put together a good time trial again for Easterns," Lobisser said. "I think if we could really come in the top three again if we pull together."

Most people do not realize the incredible amounts of teamwork that is required in cycling. The team time trial is just one example of the joint effort which is required in order to pull out a victory. The fact that the time for the third racer from each team is the only time that counts shows the incredible reliance on the team in order to have a good race.

With the points they gained by taking third, the Bison qualified for the Nationals in Berkley, Calif. from May 9-11. The entire team qualified for Nationals, but unfortunately Swanson will be unable to attend due to prior commitments. Without Swanson the other four members will have to step up and move as one through the field if they want to place in the top of pack.

"The road race course for Nationals is one of the toughest in the country, but we are all pretty good climbers," Turits said. "We will use the team and try and get through the competition."

The remaining four members of the cycling team will head out to California after finals in order to prepare for the competition.

"If we focus on the team trial and focus on working as a team, I really believe that we can medal in the team time trial," Turits said.

Cycling

Past and Present:

The history of cycling has seen many changes throughout the years. The following is a short synopsis of the changes throughout the cycling world.

1817: Hobby Horse Bicycle: Two wheels the same size added to essentially a modified hobby horse. The alignment of the front wheel is fixed. The are no peddles so the bike propelled by pushing off with your feet and the bike was steered by leaning. It was made entirely of wood.

1863: Bone Shaker or Velocipede: Made of stiff materials, straight angles and steel wheels make this bike literally a bone shaker to ride over the cobblestone roads of the day. The improvement is a front wheel with peddles.

1871: Ordinary: These are better know as the "high wheelers." It is more comfortable to ride than its predecessor, but it requires an acrobat so they popularity has always been limited. This was the first all metal machine to appear.

1880s: Many mechanical innovations now associated with the automobile were originally invented for tricycles. Rack and pinion steering, the differential and band brakes, to name a few!

1888: Pneumatic tire: First applied to the bicycle, everyone clamored to ride the bicycle.

1890: Safety Bike: Further improvement of metallurgy sparked the next innovation. This is basically the same design as standard contemporary bikes. The safety bike allowed large numbers of people to take up cycling. Bikes were relatively expensive so use was somewhat restrict to the elite.

1890: Mass Production: Women would also start riding bicycles in much larger numbers.

1900: Major Taylor was the American cycling sprint champion, and he topped all European champions as well. Taylor was one of the first black athletes to become a world champion in any sport. (Taylor is celebrated in Andrew Ritchie's the book "Major Taylor.")

1920: Kids Bikes: The focus of planning and development of the transportation infrastructure was the private automobiles.

1970: Earth Day: This movement generated a new spurt in the growth of bicycle sales and bicycling, especially around college campuses.

1973: Oil embargo: Many of the new recruits to bicycling stuck to it after the end of the embargo and became enthusiasts.

1980s: Renewed interests in health and fitness, by the middle and upper class perpetuated the acceptance and growth of commuting, recreational and touring bicycling.

1984: Successes by American racing cyclist in the 1984 Olympics drew attention and added prestige to cycling. The ranks of racing cyclists grew substantially. Cogs began to be added to the rear gear cluster the number of speeds increase from 15 to 18, 21 and 24.

1996: Mountain bikes begin competition at the Olympic Games.

1986: Department of the Interior and Nielson surveys show that bicycling is the third most popular participatory sport after swimming and general exercise.

Who needs the W column, anyway?

There's nothing quite like the first month of baseball season. After valiantly struggling to assign meaning to the events of spring training for a month, the media has schlepped its way back from the sunny innocuousness of Florida's baseball playground and into a mosh-pit of reporting that annually erupts on opening day and leaves writers scrabbling for breaking news every day thereafter until the last game of the World Series has been played.

Evaluations and interpretations come flying in from every angle. Greg Maddux must be on the verge of meltdown. Or perhaps he's just in a little slump, no cause for a ruckus. Pedro, he's just going downhill like marbles in the streets of San Francisco. Or maybe one bad game doesn't mean a thing. Mark Prior is an unworldly vessel of superior pitching, sent straight from the baseball gods to appease generations of Cubs fans for the scars of seasons passed. Or maybe he's just ... an unworldly vessel of superior pitching, sent straight from the baseball gods to appease generations of Cubs fans for the scars of seasons passed.

Much has transpired in the budding weeks of April. Darryl Strawberry has been released back into the wild, Bull Durham has ignited a tooth-and-claw spar between the National Baseball Hall of Fame and a pair of vitriolic Hollywood peace-preachers, and the perpetually unappreciated Expos have been pulling in reasonable attendance numbers—in Puerto Rico.

And, of course, the Detroit Tigers are off to another crackerjack start. That they finally managed to sneak in a win in game 10 might be a mini-miracle. After a 0-11 adventure to kick off the 2002 season, the 2003 Tigers have come roaring back to ensure the credibility of the old adage that history repeats itself.

This time they only dropped the first nine games of the season, but it's nonetheless a newsworthy display of ineptitude.

Ineptitude is kind of fun, at least for those of us watching from afar. Fans love lousy teams. So do sportswriters. It's somehow comforting to be able to chuckle at the collective misfortunes of a team like the Tigers.

Laughing at—and immortalizing—baseball's blunderers is an act of rich tradition through the sport's history. If not rich, at least a little colorful. Being self-destructively slow-out-of-the-gate isn't really a distinction any of the league's 30 teams are gunning for, but some teams throughout the past century have left their mark that way.

The 1904 Washington Senators set the standard for awkward beginnings in major-league baseball. The team was so terrible that they could even be considered bad by Senators-Nationals-Senators-Twins-Senators-Rangers standards.

Washington fans, in the early decades of the 20th century, had no choice but to seek humor in their team's yearly disastrous efforts. They even coined an unofficial motto, a slightly bastardized version of the then-familiar tribute to their city's namesake: "First in war, first in peace and last in the American League."

The Senators/Nationals took 12 years of existence to finally nail down a winning season. Before that, they were the epitome of bad. And 1904 epitomized the epitome. The team finished with a 38-113 record—last in the standings and last or near last in just about every statistical category that could possibly be construed as relevant.

What set the squad apart from other cruddy teams throughout history was its notoriously lethargic start. The team set a record by failing to pick up a win in its first 13 games of the season—a streak that went unequalled for 16 years and unbroken for 84.

The first team to equal the Senators' stumbling start was none other than the Detroit Tigers. The terrible Tigers of 1920 also dropped their first 13, but whereas the 1904 Senators managed to scrape out a tie in the midst of their winless streak, the Tigers put up a genuine 0-fer in the first two weeks of play. It was May before they finally came up with a 5-1 victory over the Indians, halting the skid and avoiding the notoriety of breaking one of baseball's more undignified records.

A losing streak of that proportion is bad anytime in the season, but when it comes at the beginning of the season, it has to invoke the subtle fear that perhaps the team will never win a game. The fear may never have been stronger than it was for the 1988 Baltimore Orioles.

The '88 Orioles are simply legendary as far as unfortunate beginnings go. They didn't just break the Senators' and Tigers' record—they obliterated it. The Uh-Oh-rioles reeled through 21 losses to start off the year, setting a new standard for ineptitude in the modern sports world.

Just five years removed from a World Series championship, Baltimore's squad had already crumbled enough that there weren't a lot of lofty expectations for them in 1988. But the Orioles outdid everyone's doubt by stringing together a 1-22 April, the worst month in modern baseball history.

The Birds lost track of North pretty much as soon as they took off, getting drummed 12-0 in their season opener. By four games in, they'd been sucked into a jet engine. Opponents had scored a combined 30 runs; the Orioles plated a measly two runners.

After game six, the team dumped manager Cal Ripken Sr., following in the footsteps of the 1904 Senators, who had fired Tom Loftus a week before their season even started. Evidently, it wasn't the answer for either franchise. The Orioles' art of incompetence ran far deeper than managerial tactics.

By the time the flightless Birds had found their footing—something lit a fire beneath their tailfeathers as they annihilated the White Sox 9-0 in the 22nd game of the season—they had set records for longest losing streak to open a season, longest losing streak in American League history and worst record over the course of a month.

But the Orioles managed to turn things around in 1989, with new uniforms and new fortune—they even made a run for the pennant, finishing second in the AL Eastern Division.

The 2003 Tigers managed to string together two consecutive opening efforts in which they lost at least their first eight games. Only one other team has done that—the team that provides historians with the textbook definition of bad beginnings, the ever-flamboyant and always-headturning New York Mets.

The Mets introduced themselves to the National League with a 40-120 record in their first season, 60 games out of the pennant chase. The squad didn't find the win column until game number 10, zipping through the first nine without securing a win.

If they didn't do enough to stamp themselves as laughably bad in their first season, the Mets earned a gold star for consistency by repeating the faulty start in 1963. They fumbled through the first eight before picking up the pace enough to finish 51-111—a precocious step up in class from 1962.

The Tigers have taken it a step further, compiling two nine-loss starts in two years. Are they really that bad, though? Their .159 team batting average doesn't bode too well for them, nor do their four home runs through Wednesday. But hey, their team ERA is only 21st in the league.

Whether or not they rank among the worst teams of all-time isn't really clear. But they've certainly placed themselves in serious company when it comes to bad beginnings.

It's hard to decide whether to laugh or pity them—it's not like they aren't trying to win. Heck, maybe they can still turn things around. They do have a handful of decent young pitchers. They just need a little spark in the offense.

Maybe Darryl Strawberry's looking for a job.

Street cred predictions

Jerry Krause, general manager of the Chicago Bulls, stepped down two weeks ago citing health problems. The unlovable big man, who bears a greater resemblance to a basketball than a basketball player, finally resigned from a post he's held for 18 years. It was about time ... the chocolate river was dried up and the rest of the Oompaloompas were getting sick of Krause's Hershey squirts.

The saddest part is his weight problem had gotten so bad that Bulls owner Jerry Reinsdorf had worked incentives into his contract for Krause to lose weight. Now putting weight stipulations into a player's contract like Mo Vaughn of the New York Mets I can understand. Mo has to hit; he has to field. He's moving around—that's a lot of motion for a planet. Krause was a GM. All he had to do was NOT have a heart attack. Is that so difficult?

Krause's legacy was a "spotty" one. Though he wasn't responsible for drafting Michael Jordan, he did bring in everyone else who made those championship teams successful. He was responsible for drafting Scottie Pippen, the world's favorite "runner-up," and Toni Kukoc from Croatia before European scouting ever became popular. Not to mention he was responsible for the signing of Horace Grant and Dennis Rodman, two big men who were essential to the Bulls success in the '90s.

And let's not forget the fact that he gave Phil Jackson his first coaching job ... perhaps that wasn't the best pro-Krause argument. Phil Jackson is living proof that Ugly and Dumb had a lovechild. Talk about being in the right place at the right time: Pippen and Jordan ... Kobe and Shaq ... let's ride Jackson's carcass to Vegas and play some craps, whaddaya say? Come on Steven, poppa needs a No. 1 pick.

A lot of people want to see Jordan return to Chicago after his "retirement." Jordan and Bill Parcells should start a multi-retirees club. Only the caveat is that Bill Parcells has to don the gear and play a season for the Cowboys ... he could only improve their defensive line. Then they should buy out the Montreal Expos, bring Gary Carter and Pete Rose back and move them all to Washington.

But what is it about Jordan's return to the Bulls that seems appealing? He's proven he doesn't work well with youngsters (Kwame Brown, for instance). He's proven he can't share responsibility (he doesn't seem to cooperate too well with Jerry Stackhouse). His grand experiment in Washington hasn't been all that impressive (they're fighting with the Bucks for the last playoff spot).

Krause, for all his girth, was an excellent talent scout. Jordan? Jordan has how much scouting experience? Jordan couldn't tell a spring chicken was raw if the E. coli were dancing the tarantella across his bald scalp. Not that the probable successor to Krause would be much better: John Paxson (you may remember him from such game-winning three-pointers as 1993, game 6, Phoenix Suns) seems to be the heir apparent and he has about as much experience scouting as Shaq has acting ability. KAZAAM!

Luckily, the Bulls will have a little time to do their search properly since the playoffs are just around the corner and those last about as long as J. C. Payne's unraveled ball of string.

Unfortunately, the next GM (whoever he may be—yes, "he" ... sexist organization) won't have the pleasure of a lottery pick to work with. Unlike Krause, who used many first round picks to sign Chandler, Curry, Crawford and Williams, the new GM will have to rely on a free agent pool weaker than a Colin Powell Security Council meeting.

What the Bulls need to do is trade Donyell Marshall for one of the top-three picks and draft LeBron James. Then they need to sign Jason Kidd and Tim Duncan. Then they could start Chandler, Duncan, Jalen Rose, LeBron and Kidd. With this power-packed lineup, the Bulls could finally be just good enough to not be as bad as the Clippers.

But let us leave at least with the memory of a healthy Krause, sitting at the draft table with a bucket of crispy strips in his lap, having his assistant turn the pages for him so he doesn't get honey mustard all over his graphs and flowcharts.

All jokes aside, Krause was a good man who was treated poorly by the "saintly" Jordan. He did great work for a great organization for a great number of years. ESPN.com writer Sam Smith speculated, "Who knows what the childhood was like, but you can only imagine. The short, fat kid wanting to hang around with the jocks and show them he belonged. It was a lifetime pursuit. But you know how the jocks are. Want it too much, and they take it away from you and throw it around and make you chase it. For Krause, it was acceptance. The more he wanted it, the farther he had to reach."

Let's hope that a good man is able to find what he's craved for so long. Feel better, Jerry.

MLB 2003: Is the apocalypse upon us?

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

After two weeks of the 2003 major-league baseball season, we have witnessed some unbelievable early season surprises that not even the smartest minds in the baseball world could have predicted. Players that have always dominated have seemingly forgotten how to play, and teams that have always been front-runners now find themselves near the basement of the league and vice versa. This begs the question: Is the major-league baseball apocalypse upon us?

It certainly would seem so if you take a look at the performance of the league's top four starting pitchers over the past three seasons. Randy Johnson, Curt Schilling, Pedro Martinez and Greg Maddux have all gotten off to atrocious starts.

The Arizona Diamondbacks' one-two punch of Johnson and Schilling has been torn apart early this season. Johnson, the league's most dominant and intimidating pitcher for almost a decade now, has had no advantage over opposing batters this year. He is 0-2 in his first three starts and has an ERA of 8.31. Schilling has also struggled this season, although not to the same magnitude as Johnson. He is also 0-2 in his first three starts, and has an ERA of 5.40, a full two points above his career average.

Martinez, a three-time Cy Young Award winner, is also yet to find the win column in 2003. He is 0-1 in his first three starts and has accrued an ERA of 5.12, almost double his career average.

Maddux has fared the worst of all the big-name pitchers, as he got shelled in his first three starts before rebounding with a solid fourth outing. Despite the strong fourth start, his ERA sits at an incredible 8.27, having allowed 19 earned runs in just 20 innings. Even worse, opponents are batting .304 this season off of Maddux, compared to their career average of .224.

Another sign that the baseball world is being turned upside down can be found in Kansas City, where the lowly Royals jumped out to an incredible 9-0 start and have accumulated a 3.5 game lead in the American League Central. During this stretch, the Royals are tied with Montreal for having allowed the fewest runs in the majors and have outscored their opponents 60-32. This is a drastic turnaround for a team that finished 62-100 last year and has not finished above .500 since the strike-shortened '94 season.

The National League standings have also been shaken up early in the 2003 campaign. In the National League East, the Atlanta Braves, winners of the division for the past 11 seasons (excluding the strike-shortened '94 season), have fallen into fourth place with a 5-8 start. The greatest shock is that the Braves, a team historically known for its dominant pitching, are leading the majors in runs allowed, with 87. While the Braves have faltered, the Montreal Expos have taken control of first place, despite having not yet played a game north of the border. During their 9-4 start, the Expos' pitching staff has been dominant, limiting its opponents to a mere 32 runs.

Meanwhile, in the National League West, the Diamondbacks, winners of the division for the past two seasons, have gotten off to a 3-10 start and already find themselves an incredible nine games behind the San Francisco Giants for first place.

Before you start building your bunkers, repenting your sins and wrapping your house in plastic and duct tape, you must realize that not everything in the world of baseball has been turned upside down so far in the 2003 season.

The Yankees are still the Yankees. After two weeks, they have built a three-game division lead with a 10-2 record and seem primed to make another run for the World Series.

On the other side of New York, the Mets are continuing to grossly underachieve. Mo Vaughn, Roberto Alomar, Jeromy Burnitz and Roger Cedeño still cannot remember how to hit a baseball, and Armando Benitez is still giving Mets fans ulcers, with three blown saves.

The Detroit Tigers are still the Detroit Tigers. Last year, it took Detroit 12 games to notch their first victory of the season. This year, despite hiring a new manager in hometown hero Alan Trammell, it took the Tigers 10 games to find the win column.

Oh yeah, one more thing—that Bonds guy in San Francisco—he is still hitting a lot of homeruns!

Bison pitching continues to dominate

"In the fourth inning of game two, there was some sloppy defense and some pitches were left up in the zone and Lehigh was able to capitalize," Ciccione said. "You can't give good teams five outs in an inning and expect to win."

The team emerged from the loss unfazed as they headed into the second doubleheader of the season.

"Our team showed tremendous character by coming back on Sunday and regaining the momentum that we lost after game two," Grant said.

The Bison struck back with a shutout of their own on Sunday, as Zach Allen '03 and Futrick combined for an impressive 1-0 shutout. The effort exemplified the impact that pitching has had for the team all season, as the duo protected a one-run lead until the end.

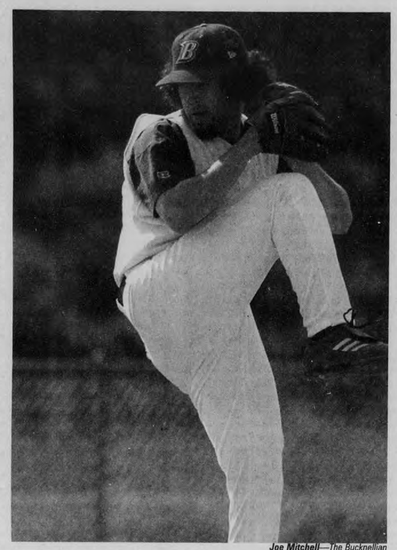
Allen earned his fourth win with six scoreless innings, giving up four hits and striking out four. Futrick added his name to the Bucknell record books with his eighth save of the season, breaking a record set by Gregg Farmery '02 in 2001. Futrick set the record just 24 games into the season.

The Bison scored their only run in the second inning. Hirschberg walked and advanced to second on a Ben Krentzman '03 bunt, and then scored when Pete Wolf '04 singled to drive the run home. The offense had four hits in the contest, but gave the team all the runs it needed.

"Our offense was limited in the first three games, but we executed well enough to manufacture a few runs and that's all our pitching staff needed," Depew said.

The offense came to life in the second game, a 6-3 victory to end the weekend. Lehigh was the first to score, jumping on the Bison with a three-hit, one-run first inning. The Bison struck back immediately with a two-run inning in the second. Walks to Krentzman, Walter and Bunting loaded up the bases for Stoll, who knocked home two runs with an RBI single.

The Bison widened their 2-1 lead in the fourth inning when B.J. Batterson '03 doubled to score Bunting. Stoll then scored Batterson with a double of his own and Moss scored Stoll with a single. The Orange and Blue managed five hits in the three-run inning as they jumped to a 5-1 advantage.



Joe Mitchell—The Bucknellian

Cory Nadler '04 pitches during a Wednesday game against Duquesne. Nadler was the winning pitcher after pitching five innings in the game.

Lehigh put two more runs on the board in the bottom of the inning to narrow the gap to 5-3, capitalizing on a pair of Bison errors and a wild pitch. The Bison held the scoring to two runs and did not allow the Mountainhawks to score for the remainder of the day.

The Bison added an insurance run in the fifth when Chris Grandizio '06 stole second and was sent home by a Batterson double. It was Batterson's second double of the game.

"It was great to see B.J. Batterson and Pete Wolf get a couple of key hits," Grant said. "It was great for their confidence and ultimately helped us take the last two games."

Matt Daley '04 earned his third save of the year as he held the Mountainhawks at bay for the final two innings of the game, allowing a hit and no runs while striking out three.

Burns earned his fourth win of the season as he went five innings, allowing five hits and three runs, only one of which was earned. Burns was pleased with the help he got from the Bison offense.

"The bats came alive, with key hits by Stoll and Batterson, providing me with enough breathing room to work with," Burns said.

Stoll pointed out the importance of the team effort throughout the road trip.

"Everybody has filled their roles these last three weekends making each and every win we've had a team win," Stoll said. "It's been a good start for us thus far, but we have our work cut out for us as some good teams lie ahead of us both in and out of Patriot League play."

The Bison next face Army in their first series at home since March 23. The Army series promises to be a tough and competitive one.

"As was the case last year, Army is peaking at the end of the season and will provide a tremendous challenge for us," Ciccione said.

Co-captain Allen anticipates a difficult remainder to the season.

"We played well on both sides of the ball, but definitely have room to continue even farther," Allen said. "Our main focus now is to not have a let down in the final two Patriot League series. We must continue to play the way we have, if not better, to have the same results against Army and Lafayette."

The team will be glad to return to action at home after a long string of road games.

"It will be good to play at home this upcoming weekend against Army, who beat us four times last year, to show our fans what they have been missing while we were on the road," Burns said.

Depew also looks forward to the upcoming schedule.

"I think the opportunity to play a few midweek games will be helpful to our hitters," Depew said. "We're looking forward to playing some home games in the next two and a half weeks."

Track records broken

was also pleased to see other hurdlers making progress.

"Our hurdlers, [Richard] Alexander ['03] and Mellas, are improving," Donner said.

Besides MacDonald, the women were led with wins by junior Maria Garcia's NCAA regional qualifying hammer throw (173-9) and senior Nicki Piper's wire-to-wire 800 victory. Charity Brady '03 added to the effort by running a seasonal best in the 200.

"Brady is racing great with her fast 200 and I was very happy with MacDonald, [Edwina] Bourn ['03] and [Jamie] Lilien ['04]," Donner said. "Piper and [Jen] Marsh ['05] are running nicely in the 800, and Garcia is throwing nicely in the hammer. We do need to get a few people back on track who have been in a little rut if we want to defend our championship. I am confident that will happen."

Because of a number of nagging injuries, the coaching staff decided to give most of the jumpers a week off.

"Jumping takes a toll on the legs and my staff felt it was a good weekend for many of them to rest," Donner said. "We have a big meet this coming weekend and we plan to load up and try to win."

The meet takes place tomorrow at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium and should be highly competitive.

"It will be a five-team scored meet. On the men's side, it is Kent State, Rhode Island, Wagner and Robert Morris. On the women's side, it is Kent State, Colgate, Wagner and Robert Morris," Donner said. "It's nice to get a very formidable team such as Kent State here at home. They are a very good team in a powerful conference. Their women won the indoor title and they always seem to have an All-American or two on both sides. Rhode Island's men are a well balanced team that has won previous Atlantic-10 titles. We would love to win both meets. A win in this meet would give us great momentum heading into the Patriot League meet in two weeks."

Loss to Army is first league loss this year

By Pat Evans

The Bison men's lacrosse team had three different three-goal leads against Army, but was unable to put the Black Knights away, losing its first league contest of the year 10-9. With the loss the Bison move down to second place in the league and will likely need Hobart to beat Army this weekend in order to win the Patriot League outright and earn an NCAA Tournament bid.

The Bison had beaten Army the past three years and appeared to be on their way to making it a fourth after scoring three unanswered goals and enjoying a 3-1 lead after the first quarter. Army finally answered in the second quarter, cutting the lead to one at 4-3, but once again the Bison stretched their lead to three as Patrick Christensen '05 and Kelly Hogue '03 rattled off back-to-back goals to make it 6-3.

The Black Knights cut that lead to two, making it 7-5 going into the fourth quarter. Andrew Sanders '03, who finished with three goals and two assists in the game, put one in early in the fourth quarter to make it 8-6, and the Bison looked as if they were going to stay in control until the end. But Army battled back, owning the fourth quarter to take the win.

"We let them hang around, which gave them a shot to win it, and they did," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said.

The last eight minutes of the fourth quarter in particular were a struggle for the Bison, who had only two possessions and turned the ball over on each one. Army scored three straight goals to take the lead.

"They're very well conditioned and so they were able to control the fourth quarter when they needed to," Jamieson said.

Sanders dodged down the left sideline and beat Army's goalie to tie the game at 9, but not much later the Black Knights mimicked that play and scored with just 2 minutes, 08 seconds remaining to make it 10-9 in their favor.

In the closing moments the Bison had several chances, but were unable to capitalize. With 50 seconds to play, Rob Lane '03 hit the post and Army cleared the ball. Then, with 10 seconds remaining the Bison called a time out and diagrammed a play that gave them a shot at tying it up. The Bison worked the ball behind the cage until Sanders came around and tried to stuff one in that was blocked. Chris Cara '05 got the rebound but didn't have time to get another good opportunity.

"That was the story of the day for us," Jamieson said. "We rode well, cleared the ball well, but didn't shoot the ball the whole game."

Despite being beaten in the category of time of possession, the Bison did outshoot Army by a significant amount (41-27) and ld the game for the vast majority of the time.

"In reality we were in command of the game until the end, but we didn't get it done when we had to get it done," Jamieson said.

Hobart, a team that the Bison beat earlier in the season, now takes the lead in the Patriot League and will square off against Army for what will most likely determine the outcome of this year's league champion. The Bison are hoping that Hobart will beat Army, which would most likely put the Herd in first place, assuming that they win the rest of their league games.

Before worrying about what happens elsewhere in the league, the Bison are taking care of their own business so that if an opportunity does present itself, they are in position to take it.

"These next two games are a must for us," Jamieson said. "We're very disappointed, but we want to get going, we've got strong kids and we've been practicing well, so it looks good."

Softball victim of four-game Colgate sweep

Colgate took all four games from Bucknell last weekend in Hamilton, N.Y., dropping the Bison to 6-23 overall and 3-6 in the Patriot League.

Kris Devore '06 knocked out the first home run of her collegiate career in the final game of the series, bringing in three runs in the sixth inning. This chipped away at the 4-0 lead the Red Raiders had taken in the fifth. Kristen Potts '04 got on base first with a one-out single, and Angela Stackhouse '04 followed her with a base-on-balls. Both runners advanced on a wild pitch to put them in scoring position before Devore smashed a pitch over the right center fence to bring the team within one. Colgate tacked on three more runs in the bottom of the inning to put the game out of reach, as Bucknell took the 7-3 loss.

Earlier in the day, the team posted a 3-2 loss. RBI singles by Jennifer Ross '05 and Kimberly Grunwald '06 propelled the Bison to an early 2-1 lead in the second inning. The Raiders answered right back with two runs, including the game-winner, in the third.

On Sat., April 12, the Orange-and-Blue dropped the first two games of the series in Hamilton, N.Y. Colgate staked out a first inning 2-0 lead to put Bucknell in the hole early. The Bison got on the board with one run in the third inning, but the Raiders answered right back with two more in the second half of the frame en route to a 6-2 Bison loss.

The first game was knotted at three until the bottom of the seventh inning when Colgate got the game-winning run to knock off Bucknell 4-3. The Bison went up 2-0 in the second inning on singles from Jill Pompeii '05 and Meredith Gill '03, before the Raiders tied it up in the third. Bucknell tacked on one more run in the fifth, but Colgate answered right back in the bottom of the fifth to keep the game knotted until their seventh-inning game-winning run.

On Sun., April 6, the Bison knocked off visiting Lafayette twice to take the first half of the season series. In the nightcap of the doubleheader, the team posted a come-from-behind 6-5 victory. The Leopards got on the scoreboard first with two runs in the first inning on one hit and two Bison miscues. The Bison came right back in the bottom half of the inning to knot the game at two. Stackhouse hit a two-out single to center. Lauren Wible '06 then nailed a triple to score Stackhouse. Wible crossed the plate on an errant throw to second base in a pick-off attempt.

Lafayette went up 4-2 in the third inning on a double and a Bucknell error. The Bison made it a one-run game in the fifth when Stackhouse reached base on an error and Wible hit a RBI double to left field. The Leopards led 5-3 going into the bottom of the seventh inning before a few hits and a few breaks got the Bison three runs and ultimately, a victory.

Potts walked and advanced to second on a passed ball. Stackhouse drew a base-on-balls and another passed ball sent her to second and Potts to third. Potts crossed the plate one out later on a wild pitch. Stackhouse then scored on an error by the shortstop. Devore, who got on base on the shortstop's error, scored on a Kelli Haskins '05 routine fly to right field that was dropped.

Earlier in the day, the Bison took an 11-1 decision from the Leopards in five innings. They hit Lafayette pitcher Jackie Fitzgerald hard with an eight-run first inning on five hits and one error. Gill led off with a double to the left field wall and eventually scored on a wild pitch. With two outs and the bases loaded, Lauren Box '03 smacked a bases-clearing double to give the Bison a 5-0 edge. Pompeii hit a single up the middle and stole second to put runners on second and third. Gill nailed a triple in her second at-bat of the inning to put the tally at 7-0. A Potts RBI single to the shortstop made it 8-0.

The Orange-and-Blue tacked on two more runs in the second inning on two Lafayette errors. The Leopards staged a two-out rally in the fourth to get back one run, but the Bison got it right back in the bottom half of the inning. Alyssa Schneebaum '06 singled and Gill sacrificed to score Schneebaum to make the score 11-1. A one-two-three top of the fifth allowed the 10-run rule to be invoked.

According to Head Coach Janelle Breneman, the team was able to effectively put together the offense and the defense. They faced a more difficult pitcher in the second game and were still able to string together hits.

"We're starting to get some people out of their hitting slumps ... (and) starting to have smarter at-bats," Breneman said.

She also commended Haskins on her strong pitching performance in the second game. Haskins gave up seven hits, and struck out four while only walking two. Only two of the five Lafayette runs were earned.

The Bison return to action at 1 p.m. Saturday and noon Sunday when Lehigh comes to town.

fill in the gap against Vermont, claiming the doubles point in a clean sweep and winning four of six singles matches.

Gaskin was undefeated after the Vermont match and Veronica Brown '06 won her seventh straight in singles play.

"With Jill out we really had to rely on our depth, which is something we've always been able to do," Helt said. "We played tough and pulled it out."

The Bison suffered just their third loss this season against Binghampton, a match that may have gone the other way if Wurzburg had been in the lineup. The Herd swept the doubles point, but lost four of the six singles matches in the loss.

Upcoming for the women's squad are two challenging Patriot League foes, Army and American, which will be critical matches for the Bison if they want to compete for high placement in the league.

"They are two of the toughest teams in our conference," Helt said. "We go in knowing that we have the opportunity to win. We have the talent, it will just be a matter of performing well."

The men's team has shown signs of improvement, but has been unable to get the wins. After beating Towson at home, the Bison have been on a four-game skid, starting with a loss to Binghampton 5-2 in which Asher Salam '06 and Todd Jacobs '03 were the lone winners.

Jacobs and Salam teamed up to win one of the doubles matches in the next match against Colgate but the Bison couldn't get the doubles point. The team did muster two wins in singles play with Salam and Aaron Saperstein '06 pulling through, but Colgate ended up with the 5-2 win.

The following match against Lehigh was the closest league match yet for the Bison. The men's team has had their eyes on the Mountain Hawks since the beginning of the season, knowing that they had a chance at picking up the league win.

After Jacobs and Salam won one of the doubles matches it came down to Nick Denefrio '05 and Gerald DiChiara '05 to win the point overall. It came down to a tiebreaker point before Denefrio and DiChiara lost 9-8, giving Lehigh a 1-0 lead in the overall match.

The Bison split the match in singles play, winning three of six, but this was not good enough and Lehigh took the win 4-3.

"I thought we were going to win and we very much should've taken some of those points," Helt said. "But we let down when we had our opportunities."

Despite the Bison's record this season, the team is optimistic about its future and what this season has done for its players.

"I've gotten a lot of experience playing at this level, which I wasn't used to before," Salam said. "I think it's going to help me a lot later this season and going into the next one."

Helt is also pleased with how the men's team is progressing, believing that her team's effort has been incredible despite being overmatched in almost every contest.

"For most teams and most coaches this would be a very disappointing season, but for us we're getting so many positive things out of it," Helt said. "Our losses have not been because of a lack of effort, we've really been battling and they've been fantastic."

the Wildcats by narrow margins in their two games against Villanova during the regular season, so they knew it would be a difficult task.

The Herd came out strong early, getting on the board first when Blitzer took a pass from Keffer and put one in just 29 seconds into the contest. Keffer set up Bardoe 2:31 later to give the Bison a 2-0 advantage, but the Wildcats came back and scored just 40 seconds into the second quarter to get their first lead of the contest.

The Bison took control again when they scored three unanswered goals including a desperation shot by Larissa Brown '05 that sailed over the goalie's head just before the halftime buzzer, making the score 6-4.

After a defensive battle in the third quarter during which neither team scored, Stahler backhanded one in to give the Bison a seemingly safe three goal cushion. But the Wildcats once again came back and tied the score at 7 during a lapse of the Bison defense.

"The main problem was that we played to maintain our lead rather than stretch it, so we should have actually won by more," Keffer said. "Despite that we still came through in the end."

It took an overtime period for the Bison to take the lead for good and OK win the game. Stahler scored just 23 seconds into the overtime frame and Keffer took a pass from Bardoe to give the Bison a two-goal cushion. The Wildcats came back for a third time, scoring one more goal, but this time it was too late as the Bison took the game and fifth place finish with the 9-8 win.

"Villanova never stopped fighting, but we never stopped working and we were able to get it done," Zeigler said. "Villanova played an excellent game."

The Bison will open up Eastern's against Iona, a team that beat the Herd 5-4 the game right before Southern Championships.

"It will be a critical game for us," Zeigler said. "The nice thing is that we'll be able to avenge that earlier loss to them."

The Orange and Blue will be a 10th seed at Eastern's and while they hope they can win the whole tournament, which would give them a bid to the NCAA Tournament, the team will see it as a major accomplishment to finish somewhere in the top 7 of the field.

"We're looking to win the first game against Iona and let the momentum carry us," Bardoe said.

The Bison women's water polo team struggled this past weekend at ECACs held at Princeton University, dropping all three of their games. Harvard got the best of the Bison, 8-5, on Saturday, followed by a loss to 16th-ranked Hartwick 11-3. The following day, the Bison battled to the end with Iona but were unable to close it out, dropping 5-4.

"Fundamentally we had a very good game and we had very strong defense," Stahler said. "Offensively we had a lot of opportunities, but unfortunately we couldn't get it done."

The next game against 16th-ranked Hartwick was simply a case of the Bison being overmatched. Stahler was the Bison's only bright spot, scoring two of the Bison's three goals, while registering five steals and drawing three ejections.

"Their defense really made us struggle," Zeigler said. "They were dropping people back and making us shoot from outside, and we didn't shoot with confidence."

In a defensive battle that saw little scoring, the Bison were edged out by Iona 5-4 the next and final day of the tournament. Iona came out to an early 3-1 lead after the first quarter and the Bison came back to trail by just one, 4-3 going into the half.

The Bison defense shut out Iona in the final quarter of play but could only muster one goal, resulting in the loss. Goalie Lindsey Chesterfield '03 anchored the defense for the Bison, saving 10 shots and grabbing two steals.

"We played a really good game, but they forced us to take a lot of shots that we didn't want to take," Zeigler said.

The Bison open up the tournament at 6:15 p.m. tonight in Kinney Natatorium.

Joy Dickson '03 donates her mane to Locks of Love for the fourth time

Campus Community Service

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

It is certain that there are many women out there, and possibly even a few men, who have decided the time has come to do away with the excess inches of hair that adorn their heads in favor a shorter, hipper style. For those of you who find a grain of truth in this statement, perhaps you should consider following the example of a fellow University student and donating those extra inches to Locks of Love. Locks of Love's Web site describes the group as a "nonprofit organization that provides hairpieces to financially disadvantaged children across the United States under age 18 suffering from long-term medical hair loss." Why throw away all those lovely inches you spent so much time tending to when the very hair you're finished with could represent a new, brighter beginning to an unfortunate child?

Courtesy of Joy Dickson

Joy Dickson '03, a business management major, has lovingly donated her locks four times to this organization, most recently shortly after spring break. Her normally long, thick hair is now bobbed just above her shoulders and what was cut off is now a wig for a young girl. Seeing a story on Locks of Love sparked Dickson's interest in the organization, and she thought it would be a wonderful activity. Most donations go to young girls, as society is much more accepting of hairless men. Dickson saw this as an easy way to help people, so she started down a path that she continues to travel.

"I've always had long hair. I have pictures of me in kindergarten with hair down to my waist. But it is only hair. It will grow back," Dickson said.

Since her first donation, she's convinced family members and friends to donate to Locks of Love. Her mother and sister have both joined in her philanthropic endeavors. Her sister actually removed Dickson's ponytail for the last donation. Dickson has also convinced members of her service fraternity, Alpha Phi Omega, to donate as well.

"I brought my ponytail in a bag to convince the other girls. I believe two went and got their hair cut," Dickson said.

When asked about Dickson, her closest friends said that donating to Locks for Love was only a small part of the generosity for which she is known.

"I am not surprised that Joy donates her hair to Locks of Love," close friend Emily Monahan '03 said. "This contribution was just one particular example of her selfless giving. It is in her sweet and generous nature to help others in any way she can."

"Joy is a very cheerful person and enjoys life," Leilani Shughart '06, a close friend, said. "I think she has been so generous with her hair because she knows that someone will be happier because of the wig created. For Joy, the sacrifice of her hair is well worth someone else's happiness."

For anyone with an interest in Locks of Love, the organization has a Web site with all the frequently asked questions as well as details about donation. At www.locksoflove.org you can download the form for donation that can be taken to most salons, and can also find out donation qualifications. Though Dickson usually does her donating closer to home outside of Philadelphia, most establishments are familiar with the organization and have accepted similar donations before.

If you encounter a group that has never donated before, the form makes it very easy. Although it takes at least 10 inches of hair to make a wig, less hair is often accepted and sold to doll makers, generating profits that help the organization. If you're not sure if your mane qualifies, know that curly, permed, colored, layered and even gray hair is accepted.

Members of the Bucknell Chapter of Habitat continue to raise awareness and money for "Bucknell House"

By Meghan Ball
Features Editor

Anyone who walked into Bertrand Library last week saw a group of students selling baked goods and hot chocolate and talking excitedly about "Bucknell House." They were representatives of the Bucknell Chapter of Habitat for Humanity. Had it not snowed, they would have built a cardboard house on the Academic Quad to make sure everyone on campus knew about "Bucknell House." Due to the weather, the house was placed in the library. Curious yet?

Last year, Co-Presidents Brian Standinski '02 and Sarah Rives '02 of the Bucknell Chapter of Habitat for Humanity decided that they were sick of having to travel on Saturdays to work on a Habitat house with a maximum of five to six students. Their idea was to build a Bucknell house, one to which they could send large groups of University students every weekend. Starting this fall, the Bucknell Chapter and Union Snyder Affiliate will share that house.

Rae Purcell—The Bucknellian

Current President of the Bucknell Chapter Michelle Gezo '04 is very excited about having increased opportunities for students within Habitat at a nearby location.

"Habitat allows students to come together and really make a difference in the world through either building or raising money for those less fortunate," Gezo said.

Habitat members are raising $20,000 as a donation toward the house. Last year the group raised about $11,000. They raised money through the selling Popsiclesticks to build a "house," bake sales, holiday card sales, grants and donations. Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity's Luiji Fiji and Management 101 group Earl's EZ Tees donated their profits toward the goal.

Sudents participated in Habifest, a nationwide celebration of Habitat for Humanity. The national goal was to raise awareness about poverty issues. At the University, students placed emphasis on raising awareness about "Bucknell House." Over 10,000 students at 150 schools held activities on April 9 to drum up support for Habifest. Kim Drozynski '04 saw the event as a wonderful opportunity.

"College campuses are an excellent source of volunteers," Drozynski said. "This is a chance to make people aware of the need and recruit help."

At the University, Habifest included a showing of "With Honors," a bake sale to raise money for the "Bucknell House" and flyers, posters and e-mails filled with facts on both Habitat for Humanity and poverty.

In addition to raising money, the group is also trying to raise awareness. The house will be in Mifflinburg, 15 minutes away from the University. The plan is to send a group to the site every weekend. Because they will be able to accommodate groups of all sizes, the hope is that student organizations, fraternities and sororities will spend Saturday working on the house.

Drozynski, who has been on Habitat trips, said it is a great opportunity.

"The hands-on working experience gives a real sense of what you can do for others," Drozynski said. "I enjoyed working with so many other people that are truly passionate about the organization and what it can do to help others. Furthermore, the relationships we build as a group last when we come back to Lewisburg."

Rae Purcell—The Bucknellian

Habitat For Humanity has since built over 125,000 homes for more than 625,000 people in 83 different countries since its founding in 1976. The homes are built by both volunteers and the new homeowners.

Homes are sold with no interest and for no profit. The homeowner must make a down payment, complete monthly payments and commit hundreds of hours to building other homes. Homes in developing nations cost as little as $8,000, but in the United States the average cost is around $46,000.

Homeowners are selected by the affiliates Family Selection Board. For "Bucknell House," Gezo helped to choose the family that will receive the house.

Droyznski said students should participate to help a good cause.

"Decent, affordable housing is the foundation for a solid life for a family. Everyone deserves a roof over their head, running water and heat. The families we help are not 'bad,' they are just in an unfortunate situation," Drozynski said.

United Way Day of Caring—University loving the community back

By Elisabeth Hulette
Staff Writer

Two weeks ago, Erin Whyte '04 and MaryAnn Beranek '04 proved that the Bucknell "bubble" doesn't have to exist.

They proved what wonderful things can be accomplished when students break out of the "bubble" and venture into the wide world of the surrounding community. Dual-handedly, Whyte and Beranek were responsible for organizing the Union County's United Way Day of Caring, a service event that pulled hands and help from both the University and various community service agencies in Lewisburg and beyond.

Courtesy of Erin Whyte

Their story begins back at the start of the semester, with Whyte's application for a political science course designed to incorporate six hours of fieldwork into each week's study time. Whyte was assigned to work with Union County's United Way, one branch of the national umbrella organization that raises money to fund local nonprofit agencies. The task they selected for her internship's focus was the Day of Caring.

The premise behind the Day of Caring is a unique one—to do service for organizations that serve the community. By organizing community members to do spring cleaning, window washing, painting and yardwork at these service agencies, the United Way prevents the agencies from having to take time and money away from their own projects for such necessary grunt work. The day also provides an opportunity for members of the community who have benefited from these organizations to give something back.

United Way chapters across the country hold Days of Caring annually, but, until this year, one had never been organized for Union County. This meant Whyte had to begin the entire process from scratch. Wisely, the first thing she did was ask for help.

Her professor found her a partner in Beranek, who joined Whyte as a second intern at the United Way, earning academic credit for her service by listing her internship as a nontraditional study program.

And so the two began to plan their day. Square one involved raising the money it would take to buy cleaning, painting and outdoor work supplies, and doing that required a letter-writing campaign. Requests for donations were sent to all sorts of local businesses and organizations.

"We did every little thing ourselves," Beranek said. "We sent letters, raised money, publicized the event, got volunteers and made buttons."

All of this work took a lot of time.

"Total, we did about 200 hours of work between us," said Whyte, who even did a guest spot on the radio station WKOK to advertise the event to the community. "We're both the kind of people who wouldn't do anything that wasn't to the best of our ability."

As the event drew near, the girls turned to the University for support, and found their best response in the Greeks. Chi Omega, Delta Delta Delta (Tri-Delta), Phi Beta Phi and Delta Gamma sororities volunteered their sisters to serve at the event. Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity brothers helped out as well. Community volunteers from Sun Bank, PA House, Mifflinburg Bank and other local groups also signed up for the event, bringing the community's total to 40 volunteers, alongside 60 University students.

"It was great to see the Greek community coming together to do service," Whyte said.

When the Day of Caring finally arrived on April 5, all 100 volunteers arrived early in the morning to be greeted with a breakfast donated by the Country Cupboard Inn. The groups then split off to their assigned agencies—Sigma Phi Epsilon painted the gym at the Community Center, Tri-Delta reorganized the storage facility at the Red Cross, Chi Omega landscaped and cleaned the YMCA and Delta Gamma and Pi Beta Phi cleaned the basement of Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition.

"It was amazing, all the work that was accomplished that day," Beranek said.

Courtesy of Erin Whyte

Beranek said the most rewarding part of the day was seeing the Sigma Phi Epsilon brothers interacting with a group of children who also came to paint.

"A bunch of kids were there trying to meet a community service challenge, and the boys just embraced them, even played with them. It was nice seeing the two groups come together, and it was a good example of what the day was all about," Beranek said.

At the end of the day, two of the volunteer groups, Phi Beta Phi and Tri-Delta, offered to go back to their respective sites to finish some outdoor painting at a later date. The rest of the volunteers packed up their brooms and brushes, Windex and sponges, and Whyte and Beranek sat down to write a very tall stack of thank-you notes.

"I think the community members were pleased to see Bucknell students in a positive light," Whyte said.

Whyte and Beranek valued the experience of organizing the event.

"It was an invaluable learning opportunity. It was really worth it," Whyte said.

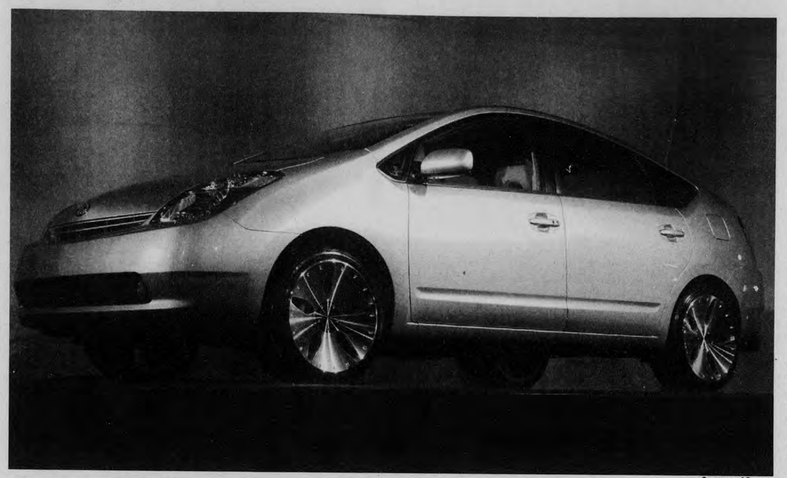
Hydrogen fuel: environmental friend or folly?



Courtesy of Reuters

The Toyota Prius is a "full hybrid system" car that can operate in either gas or electric modes. Although hybrid cars are more efficient than pure gasoline cars, those powered by hydrogen, which has been touted as "the fuel of the future," would be even more efficient and environmentally friendly.

By Kyle Lange
Staff Writer

Who would have ever thought that a Republican president from Texas would pledge more than $1 billion to help develop hydrogen-powered automobiles? U.S. President George W. Bush could hardly be labeled as environmentally friendly, but he seems to have come to the realization that the world's oil supply is finite. The United States is now one of many nations funding research on what has been touted as "the fuel of the future" for the past 80 years.

Energy is critically important to the United States. Every day, products, people and services are shipped, driven and flown all over the world by vehicles using some source of energy. Heat and electricity are provided by energy. Clearly, without access to a cheap source of energy, the United States will not be able to function as it has been.

If the world's oil supply is diminishing, why is hydrogen the fuel of choice? What makes it a better candidate than coal or nuclear power? In short, hydrogen is the environmentalist's dream fuel. Hydrogen mixed with oxygen yields energy and water vapor. The process does not emit pollutants or carbon dioxide, and because chemical energy is directly converted into electrical power, hydrogen fuel cells can be twice as efficient as gasoline engines. Furthermore, hydrogen is the most abundant element in the universe.

The main problem is that hydrogen cannot be mined from the ground like oil, coal or natural gas. Pure hydrogen evaporates quickly from the earth's atmosphere, and the only way to obtain hydrogen in its pure form is to break down a compound that contains it, such as oil, natural gas or water. In an ideal world, people would use hydrogen for energy, but something must provide the energy to create the hydrogen in the first place.

The environmentalist's solution is to use renewable sources of energy to provide electricity to break down water. Solar panels, geothermal springs, hydroelectric dams and windmills would provide electricity to break down water into hydrogen and oxygen. The hydrogen could then be used to power vehicles and heat homes yielding no pollutants or greenhouse gases.

In short, hydrogen is the environmentalist's dream fuel.

There are several problems with this approach. The first problem is that it is currently more expensive to generate electricity using renewable sources of energy than oil or coal. For example, the Saudi Arabian General Investment Authority reported that in Saudi Arabia, it costs only $1.50 to produce a barrel of oil, from which 20 gallons of gasoline can be produced. Until renewable sources of energy become economically viable, this ecotopia cannot be reached.

The second problem lies in what happens when energy is converted from one form to another. Assistant Professor of Physics Jack Gallimore said there is a problem with this solution.

"The problem boils down to the second law of thermodynamics," Gallimore said. "When you use electricity to make hydrogen, and then use hydrogen to make electricity, you generate waste energy with each process. You don't get out all of the energy that you put into it."

The more economical approach would be to break down oil and natural gas in order to produce hydrogen. In breaking down oil and natural gas, carbon dioxide and greenhouse gases are emitted, defeating one of the main purposes of using hydrogen fuel.

One future method of producing hydrogen may be to use a type of green algae that produces hydrogen when photosynthesis is no longer possible. Researchers at UC-Berkeley are currently working on genetically engineering green algae to produce hydrogen regardless of whether or not photosynthesis is an option.

Another problem with using hydrogen fuel is one of transportation and storage. Hydrogen is a gas at room temperature and cannot be easily contained. Since it is a gas, hydrogen takes up much more room in a fuel tank.

Some auto manufacturers have designed vehicles with insulated fuel tanks to keep hydrogen in its liquid form. Liquid hydrogen still evaporates and it takes a lot of energy to cool the hydrogen to that temperature.

Hydrogen gas can be compressed, but that brings up the issue of safety. Hydrogen is extremely flammable when mixed with oxygen, and even more dangerous at high pressures.

Perhaps in the future, hydrogen might be stored in metal hydrides, which have shown the capacity to absorb hydrogen like a sponge. There has also been talk of using carbon nanotubes to store hydrogen, but again, the development of this technology would take several decades.

In spite of the barriers to the production of hydrogen, hydrogen-powered vehicles are being developed. Automotive News reported that General Motors is making six hydrogen-powered automobiles to be tested on the streets of Washington D.C., later this year. Shell Hydrogen is cooperating to produce a hydrogen fuel pump for servicing the vehicles. General Motors plans to make the vehicles available for people to test drive, hoping to get feedback from 10,000 drivers over the next two years.

Iceland has unveiled a more ambitious plan to become the world's first hydrogen economy. By using its geothermal resources, Iceland is creating hydrogen to power cars, buses, homes, offices and fishing boats. According to Newsweek, Iceland hopes to become the "Kuwait of the North" by 2020, with hydrogen as its primary export.

In the United States, it is unlikely that hydrogen will become the fuel of choice soon. While it is economically feasible to create the infrastructure for hydrogen fuel in an island nation of 280,000 people, Shell Hydrogen estimated that it would cost the United States $19 billion to do the same.

An MIT study recently concluded that even by 2020, hydrogen fuel cells would not be preferable to diesel-hybrid motors in terms of carbon dioxide and greenhouse-gas emissions. Even with the research that is taking place to improve hydrogen fuel cells, it will be a long time before they become environmentally and economically viable.

Even with the research that is taking place to improve hydrogen fuel cells, it will be a long time before they become environmentally and economically viable.

The United States is still reluctant to rely on the Middle East for oil, especially with the current diplomatic relations with Saudi Arabia and Iraq.

Associate Professor of Political Science Tony Massoud said that it is unlikely the United States will stop importing oil from the Middle East.

"On one hand, we don't want to be dependent on a part of the world that is politically unstable," Massoud said. "On the other hand, it is very cheap for companies to extract oil from the Middle East and will probably continue to be much cheaper than the cost of producing hydrogen. Oil-producing states have so far been successful in convincing oil importers of the economic rationale for not lessening their dependence on Middle Eastern oil."

The United States does not seem ready to pay the price to make hydrogen fuel its main source of energy. Yet if the geopolitics work out unfavorably, and the earth's temperature continues to rise, don't be surprised if the United States tries to follow Iceland's lead.

Searching for aliens 101—the SETI Project

By Kyle Lange
Staff Writer

The Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligence (SETI), although unsuccessful in its ultimate goal for the past 40 years, continues as scientists propose innovative ways to discover alien communications.

The SETI@home project employs the long-standing approach of looking for extraterrestrial radio signals using the Arecibo radio telescope located in Puerto Rico. While the SETI@home project collects data from the entire sky, it is impossible for all of the data to be analyzed due to the limited computing power of SETI project.

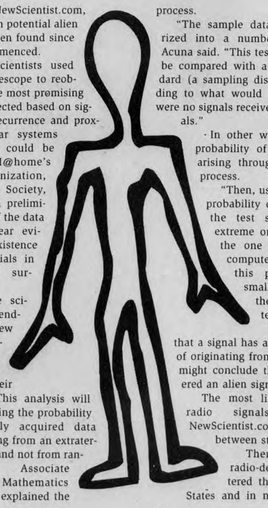
Scientists working on the SETI@home project solved this problem by enlisting the idle time of personal computers around the world. They created a screensaver that would analyze data from the Arecibo telescope whenever a personal computer was inactive.

According to BBC News Online, this screensaver, first made available in 1999, has been downloaded by several million people from over 200 countries. Collectively, over one million years of computing time have been logged by personal computers, making SETI@home the biggest terrestrial computational project ever.

SETI@home looks for signals that appear and increase in amplitude before falling off, all within a 12-second time interval—the time it takes for the Arecibo telescope to cross a point in the sky. According to NewScientist.com, over 350 million potential alien signals have been found since the search commenced.

Recently, scientists used the Arecibo telescope to reobserve 166 of the most promising candidates, selected based on signal strength, recurrence and proximity to stellar systems where planets could be located. SETI@home's funding organization, the Planetary Society, reported that a preliminary analysis of the data showed no clear evidence for the existence of extraterrestrials in the locations surveyed.

SETI@home scientists are spending the next few weeks conducting a more thorough analysis of their observations. This analysis will involve examining the probability that the newly acquired data would be coming from an extraterrestrial source and not from random noise. Associate Professor of Mathematics Carmen Acuna explained the process.



"The sample data would be summarized into a number, a test statistic," Acuna said. "This test statistic would then be compared with a predetermined standard (a sampling distribution) corresponding to what would be expected if there were no signals received from extraterrestrials."

In other words, calculating the probability of the received signal arising through a purely random process.

"Then, using the standard, the probability of finding a value of the test statistic that is as extreme or more extreme than the one observed would be computed," Acuna said. "If this probability is very small it will suggest that they had found extraterrestrials."

If scientists find that a signal has a very low probability of originating from random noise, they might conclude that they had discovered an alien signal.

The most likely sources of the radio signals, according to NewScientist.com, are satellites, dust between stars and interference.

There are many other radio-detection projects scattered throughout the United States and in nations such as Italy and Australia. The most promising radio-detection project for the future is the Allen Telescope Array. Currently under construction, the array is expected to start collecting data by 2005.

The Allen Telescope Array, predominantly funded by donations from Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen, will be the first radio telescope array primarily built for the purpose of searching for extraterrestrial signals. According to the SETI Institute, the most active organization in SETI research, the Allen Telescope Array could expand current search capabilities by a factor of 100.

While surveying the sky for radio signals has been the most common way to look for extraterrestrials, scientists now also look for optical signals. They suggest that an alien civilization may not be sending radio messages to Earth, but rather laser pulses.

NewScientist.com reports that the current laser technology enables scientists to create brief laser pulses up to 5,000 times brighter than the sun.

Since radio messages are susceptible to interference and are dispersed easily throughout the cosmos, some scientists have suggested that intelligent aliens might be trying to contact us using laser pulses.

The main disadvantages of the optical approach are that laser signals cannot travel as far as radio signals through the cosmos and that humans could only detect laser signals if extraterrestrials specifically directed them to the earth.

Nevertheless, optical search for extraterrestrial intelligence (OSETI) projects have sprung up throughout the country at universities such as UC Berkeley, Princeton and Harvard.

Perhaps the most bizarre and cost-effective approach to searching for extraterrestrials comes from Allen Tough, professor emeritus of adult education at the University of Toronto.

In 1996, Tough created a Web site, the Invitation to ETI, that welcomes aliens to Earth and invites them to e-mail him.

Tough hypothesizes that an intelligent alien civilization would monitor human activity on the Internet, which is why e-mail would be a logical forum for communication.

Although the idea is strange, Tough has brought together a team of 80 individuals, many of them professors at other universities, to deal with any cases of alien contact.

All of the communications sent to Tough so far have been hoaxes.

Assistant Professor of Physics Ned Ladd said the research is an investment.

"Most scientists view SETI as the classic longshot bet. The odds of finding anything are incredibly low," Ladd said. "However, the potential payoff for detecting extraterrestrial intelligence is huge, both scientifically and culturally."

The search continues, for radio waves, lasers or even e-mails, with each project hoping to hit the jackpot.

The grand opening of the Annual Student and Faculty Art Exhibition will be held at 5 p.m. tonight at the Samek Art Gallery. Once a year the art gallery exhibits a variety of student works from each of the studio courses offered on campus as well the artwork of professors and graduate assistants. This semester, close to 100 pieces will be on display from photography, sculpture, drawing, printmaking and painting classes, to name a few. "It is a really exciting show, even those of us involved in the arts don't always realize what is going on until it is framed, matted and presented," Director of the Samek Gallery, Dan Mills, said. "It is always an exciting act of discovery."

An independent project by Suzanne Mejean '03 involves a series of light boxes, combining photography with a sculptural element. Pete Tulaney '03 will be exhibiting a sculpture formed inside part of the stump of a maple log and lit by a glow stick. Other types of works range from a photo collage of crushed cars to a giant dragonfly to a woodcut of a sugar box.

An installation involving video and photography by Assistant Professor of Art and Art History Tulu Bayar in collaboration with two of her students will be displayed in one of the side rooms.

"It is always interesting to see what your peers are doing," said Kathleen Scott, graduate assistant for the printmaking and drawing classes. "It's art that is relevant to your life and part of your generation."

Mills enjoys seeing growth within the department.

"Every year there are different strengths and you can see a clear progression from the past," Mills said.

Scott agrees and looks forward to the opening of the high-quality student show.

"I think the quality of work is very high this year," Scott said. "The woodcuts especially are on a grander scale and seem more ambitious."

A portion of the gallery will be set aside for the work of graduate assistants in the art department including Vita Litvak, assistant for photography, Dominic Nurre, assistant in sculpture, and Scott.

"The graduate students' exhibit is a nice opportunity to see the work of advanced students who are really developing bodies of work," Mills said. "Students get to see developing young professionals who in some ways almost represent something between the undergraduates and the faculty."

The faculty show will be on display in the project room of the gallery featuring work by all faculty who teach studio courses.

"Faculty shows are a great opportunity for students to curate and to get to see a little bit of the work of people they have studied under or may study under," Mills said.

The opening reception will be held from 5-7 p.m. tonight in the Samek Gallery, where the student and faculty show will remain on display until May 2.

Klauder to sing your stress away

Kim Klauder '05 is both the producer of and sole performer in tonight's cabaret. She will sing a variety of songs that address the stresses of life.

Stressed out? Need something to relax you before the long stretch of finals begins? Then be sure to check out the cabaret at 8 p.m. tonight in the Tustin Black box theatre presented by and starring Kim Klauder '05 and you'll be sure to feel of your worries and stresses melt away, at least for an hour.

Those who have noticed a distinct lack of musical theater on campus in the past will be pleased to hear of the third musical performance this academic year. With the start-up musical theater club, a main stage musical and now a showcase cabaret, the theatre department has burst into song on several occasions.

As the star of this one-woman show, Klauder is excited for this chance to bring a little bit of herself to the University stage.

"I get to be me. I get to have fun and sing the things I like, I get to tell silly stories and make music. It's wonderful to bring things like cabaret to Bucknell," Klauder said.

The ambitious Klauder is in fact "bringing" this show to the University, as she will be continuing her history of putting on cabarets that extends to her junior year of high school. This will be her first effort of this type at the University and her fifth overall.

The definition of a cabaret is a themed musical show usually consisting of only one performer with minimal accompaniment. For this performance, Klauder has chosen the theme of "stress" and will be singing a range of theme- appropriate selections from Michelle Branch and Broadway ballads.

Also integral to the idea of the cabaret as a theatrical medium is an intimate rapport between audience and artist. Klauder seems to have this aspect covered in her reasons for organizing this show.

"I've never done a show up here and I wanted to share what I love doing with a community I have learned to really respect. People should come see it because it's fun, silly and lighthearted … hopefully they will walk away feeling good about stress, life and music."

Klauder will perform a selection of 15 songs all relating in some manner to stress. Pianist Colin Aherne '05 and drummer Tom Meskey '05 will accompany her.

"It's nice to have musicians that are so cooperative and excited about fun, free projects. I didn't realize we had such talented musicians who simply just want to play," Klauder said.

She will also be joined by guest artists Tim Wojton '03, Ahi Day '04, Miriam Sincell '06 and Jenevieve DeLoSantos '06 throughout the show.

Klauder has worked hard to bring about this show.

"Kim Klauder is one of our campus's most dedicated musical theater afficionados. I'm sure that Kim will entertain all with both verve and style in her upcoming Cabaret performance," Associate Professor of Theatre Robert Gainer said.

Klauder's genuine enthusiasm about this chance is infectious.

"I am doing this show because I simply love to sing," Klauder said, making it clear that she is attempting to bring a unique experience to the campus.

Williamsport Tea Room to host folk singer and new comer

Rachel Sage forged her own way in an Ani DiFranco world when she released her most recent album, "Illusion's Carnival"

By Rachel Hofford

❖ Music Preview

Ani DiFranco, Tori Amos and Rachel Sage—certainly you recognize two of the names; soon you may recognize the third. Sage will bring her theatrical, genre-bending music to Williamsport's Coffee and Tea Room tomorrow. An independent artist hailing from New York City, Sage is known for her intelligent, introspective folk tunes, and is frequently compared to Amos and DiFranco. There is no doubt that Sage wishes to forge her own path.

> "[The album is about] appreciating the moment and kind of heightened sensitivity to the fact that you just … have to follow your instinct."
> —Rachel Sage

"I try to not compare myself to anybody," Sage said.

This individuality is evident in her most recent album, "Illusion's Carnival," which was released on her own MPress label in 2002. Recorded following the tragedy of Sept. 11, Sage said the album was largely inspired by those events and the intense emotions that followed. The lyrical content is very serious and personal, ranging from the lament of "Unbeauty" to the longing of "Linger," a song describing a friend who survived a coma. The album's message is ultimately positive.

"[The album is about] appreciating the moment and kind of heightened sensitivity to the fact that you just … have to follow your instinct," Sage said.

Throughout "Illusion's Carnival" this musical instinct is on display as Sage showcases her piano skills and emotive vocals with seemingly effortless skill. Drums and cello accompany Sage on the album's 15 tracks, providing a rich backdrop for her intimate lyrics and complex, adventurous melodies.

Evoking jazz sentiments at one moment and exuding classical, pop or rock forms at others, it is difficult to place Sage's music in one category.

"You've got all the colors of the rainbow. Why would you choose just yellow?" Sage said in reference to her multifaceted style.

In a world of manufactured pop-music clones, her creativity and resistance to the constraints of the top 40 mold is refreshing. Calling to be interviewed from a rest stop in Wisconsin, she said she owes her success to her supporters and fans. Such an unaffected attitude is surprising coming from someone who has won several prestigious songwriting awards, including the 2001 John Lennon Songwriting Contest Grand Prize in the rock music category.

Sage is also used to large performance venues, having joined Lilith Fair in 1999 and toured with Ani DiFranco, though she said that she also enjoys playing in smaller club settings.

"The small shows are great because they're so intimate, and you really get to reach out to the audience," Sage said.

> "You've got all the colors of the rainbow. Why would you choose just yellow?"
> —Rachel Sage

Describing her shows as theatrical, spontaneous and sensual, Sage will be performing music from all four of her previously released albums when she comes to Williamsport. She will also include material from the forthcoming "Public Record," which is set for release in August.

Her show will be at 8 p.m. tomorrow at the Coffee and Tea Room. Tickets are $5 in advance.

Jennifer Butler '03

by Rachel Laskow

One day last semester, Pitch-eyed Pete walked into Wendy Hummel's third-grade classroom in Lewisburg's Kelly Elementary School. Behind the costume was not a mean pirate but instead kind-hearted Jennifer Butler '03. Butler dressed up as the pirate to kick off her social studies unit on map skills.

A student teacher for the class at the time, Butler kept the students' interest throughout the whole unit.

"I've always learned through my education classes here that you need to hook your students' attentions to truly be an effective teacher, especially when we started a whole new unit," Butler said.

Visiting Assistant Professor of Education Patsy Marra, who was also Butler's supervisor for her student teaching, recalls Pitch-eyed Pete as just one of the many ways in which Butler expressed her creativity.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

"The children got excited when they saw her, but they moved quickly to the tasks that she had assigned to them. She tried to be a swashbuckler, but her kind, considerate, thoughtful and caring personality overtook the advantage of the 'teachable moment' and she soon became the most soft-hearted pirate the world had ever seen," Marra said. "The children loved to get help from a pirate and she relished the opportunity to work with every child in the class during that lesson."

Associate Dean of Students and Director of Campus Activities and Programs Kari Conrad knows Butler through her work with Activities and Campus Events (ACE), but has also seen Butler's enthusiasm for teaching.

"As an education major, she is gifted and talented and I can think of no other individual that I would rather have teaching my children," Conrad said.

According to Hummel, Butler always helps students to the best of her ability.

"She is always looking for methods and techniques to extend and improve what she is teaching. Jen will make a wonderful addition to a teaching staff," Hummel said.

Butler also shares a sense of pride when she makes a difference in a student's life.

STUDENT 2003 PROFESSOR

Tom Travis

by Josh Fisher

You can hardly take a step in Tom Travis' Lewisburg home without stumbling upon an extravagant artifact or souvenir from one of nearly 100 foreign countries to which the professor of international relations and political science has traveled. A dizzying array of paintings from Japan, statues from India and pottery from Thailand all seem to testify to the depth of Travis' knowledge and experience.

And indeed you can hardly meander down the east wing of Coleman hall without finding a student or faculty member who vividly recalls having been inspired by Travis' provocative teaching style as a professor of political science and international relations.

The seeds of Travis' long and prominent intellectual career were first sewn when he received a Bachelor of Arts degree in psychology from Syracuse University in 1963. Travis later earned his Ph.D. in political science from the Maxwell School at Syracuse in 1969, and he pursued his true calling when he accepted a teaching position at the University in the fall of 1970.

Thirty-six years of teaching and thousands of students later, Travis is set to retire this spring, but his contributions to the University and to his students will certainly echo through lifetimes.

Assistant Dean of the Whitehead School of Diplomacy and International Relations at Seton Hall University Tom McGrath remembers Travis' class vividly.

"I want you to know that I am well aware that my journey into the world of international relations began in your classroom," McGrath told Travis after hearing he was retiring. "Any achievements by your many students are in large part the fruition of the intellectual seeds you planted and nurtured. I have always tried to be the kind of teacher that I admired when I was a student, who is someone like Tom Travis."

In 1973, only a few years after arriving at the University, Travis, along with several other faculty members, created the international relations major.

"At first it was an interdepartmental program with only a few majors, but it steadily and rapidly grew, and by the 1980s it was one of the largest majors at the University," Travis said.

Travis has served for nearly 30 years as the chair of the department of international relations, from its inception and through last year when he relinquished the directorship to Professor of International Relations Steve Stamos. Travis said that the international relations program at the University is one of the best in the country, in terms of its curricular structure and rigor, and he was elated when an outside review team described it as a "program of excellence."

Travis also feels that International Relations majors are probably the most interesting and compelling students at the University, given their interdisciplinary education and foreign language competency.

"Many international relations majors have become our University's true student leaders, from writers in The Bucknellian to student activists who have pursued successful careers in the field of international relations," Travis said.

Travis, along with Professor of Political Science Emeritus Gene Chenoweth, co-created the Global Residential College, which is designed for first-year students interested in global issues and problems.

"I have most enjoyed teaching the Global College's innovative and hard-hitting course, hanging out with students and taking them on trips to Quebec City and Washington, D.C.," Travis said. "And I am proud that many of the progressive social change movements at Bucknell have been led by global alumni."

Travis served as the senior fellow for the Global College for many years, and Global College residents have often become international relations majors due to the college's foundation seminar.

"Tom is the type of professor who got inside your head and shook things up.-He challenges and inspires his students," Global College alumna Sarah Bongarten '05 said. "He will certainly be remembered long after he is gone and will be missed by all of those fortunate to work with him."

Global College alumni Chris Purcell '03 said that Travis' style encourages careful thought and analysis.

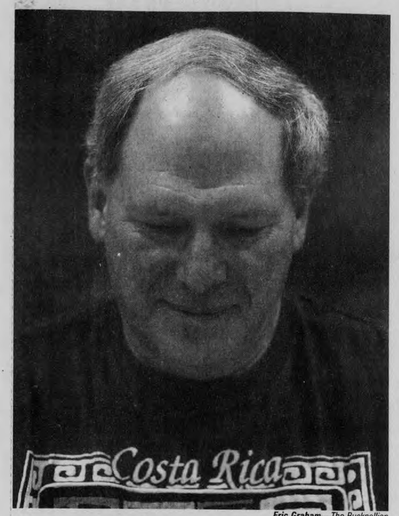
Travis retires after 33 years



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

In his 33 years at the University, Professor of Political Science and International Relations Tom Travis helped found the department of international relations and the Global Residential College. Many of Travis' students will miss his provocative and confrontational teaching style when he retires at the end of this semester.

"One of his best traits is his inability to let people accept hypocrisy, and his need to share knowledge and an open mind with others," Purcell said. "He's annoying, he's complex and I honestly respect him far more than most people on this campus."

Matthew Guarini '04 said that Travis' style of teaching challenged him to think innovatively, and not just about international relations.

"I feel that Tom is what a teacher should be—a person who makes you think and reconsider your preconceived notions, making someone think and see things from a different perspective is what broadening your horizons is all about," Guarini said.

Travis' academic successes extend beyond the classroom. The University has awarded him many prizes, including the Lindback Award, the Class of '56 Lectureship Award, the Sears Roebuck Award for inspirational teaching and the Burma-Bucknell Award for his contributions to international awareness and understanding.

Despite these awards, the highlight of Travis' career has been the biannual ceremony for the Virginia Travis Lectureship Award, named after his mother and awarded to community members dedicated to social justice. The award has of late become a campus and local community event, filling the Gallery Theatre recently when Operations Manager of the Samek Art Gallery Cindy Peltier delivered an inspiring lecture.

When asked if he had any regrets about his experience at the University, Travis said that he had a few.

"I wish that Bucknell were a more diverse place, more welcoming of ethnicity, lifestyles and ideas. And I wish that more students were politically active and committed to acting on their beliefs," Travis said. "I also regret that in the last few years so many faculty have become alienated from Bucknell and dispirited by conditions here, and, as a result, some senior faculty and retirees have removed or cut back to contributions from their wills to the University. I will wait to see what happens in the next few years before sharing finances with the University."

Travis ultimately hopes to endow partial scholarships to gay and lesbian students in honor of his daughter and to Korean-American students in honor of his son.

He said that in retrospect he has grown tremendously as a teacher, scholar and person during the last 36 years of academia. Some of his growth, he said, occurred during his sabbatical experiences, including two Fulbright Scholarships to India and a third Fulbright Scholarship to Russia.

"I learned great deal about India and Russia during these Fulbrights and enjoyed teaching international relations majors and graduate students in these countries," Travis said.

> "Tom is the type of professor who got inside your head and shook things up. He challenges and inspires his students."
> —Sarah Bongarten '05

Travis plans to spend time enjoying his avocational such as tennis, racquetball, hiking, skiing, reading and traveling.

"My wife and I love to travel and explore new cultures and venues, and I have a list of over 20 countries to which I want to travel in the next decade and more," Travis said.

Travis also plans to teach for a few years in the international relations program at an Indian university in Kerala, his favorite state in India, and a locale where he has many friends. He will also volunteer with local and international nongovernmental organizations.

"I will try to make the world a better place for the many rather than the few," Travis said.

Travis said he hopes to remain connected to the University community through the next adventure in his life, but certainly the imprint of his character will shine through the University and in the lives of his students.

> "I have most enjoyed teaching the Global College's innovative and hard-hitting course, hanging out with students and taking them on trips to Quebec City and Washington, D.C."
> —Tom Travis, professor of political science and international relations

As Jen Mellon '04 testifies and as so many students agree, "Tom Travis is by far the best professor at Bucknell University. His classes have changed my life forever, and he has contributed so much to my academic, philosophical and personal growth as both a student and a human being. His passion for teaching leaves students thirsting to learn more, and his legacy will live on at Bucknell and in my life for many years to come.

Butler excels as student leader

"It's amazing when I see the smiles on their faces when they have learned something, and I know I had a part in it," Butler said.

Butler has also had a large part in many University activities. Although she was not very involved during her first year here, it did not take long for Butler to let her natural leadership capabilities soar.

"It took me a couple of years to become independent and realize the impact I could make on this campus," Butler said.

In fact, Butler saw the need to increase leadership programming on campus and took the opportunity to help Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal develop Leadership BUCKNELL, which evolved from a Bucknell Student Government-recognized group called LEAD TEAM.

According to Badal, Butler was extremely instrumental in the planning and implementation of the Student Leadership Conference the last two years.

"She is a natural leader whose creativity and energy are contagious. I will miss her playful personality, her incredible dedication to the tasks she takes on and her silly antics," Badal said.

Butler considers her work in forming Leadership BUCKNELL one of her greatest accomplishments here and sees Badal as both a friend and a mentor.

> "She is a natural leader whose creativity and energy are contagious. I will miss her playful personality, her incredible dedication to the tasks she takes on and her silly antics."
> —Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal

"Dean Badal has inspired me. She has such a passion for everything that she does. If I could emulate her enthusiasm and zest for life, that would be fantastic. I'm lucky that I've seen that same energy in a lot of people here," Butler said.

Butler shows that same enthusiasm and energy as a resident assistant (RA). She is currently an RA for McDonnell Hall and was an RA for Roberts, Trax and Kress halls last year.

"Being an RA is an extremely rewarding experience if you let it be, and I believe I have," Butler said.

Butler's boyfriend Neil VanGinhoven '01 believes that being an RA reflects Butler's natural tendency to help others.

"This has been truly exemplified by her involvement with [the Residence Hall Association] and her pride in being an RA, where she has made the students on her hall an integral part of her Bucknell experience. Whether it was going out to bowl or making dinner for everyone on the hall, bringing everyone together has been important to her," VanGinhoven said.

Jennifer Leyton '03, also a member of the McDonnell RA staff, said that Butler has been there for her as both a friend and coworker.

"She is always there to help when someone needs it, and the best thing about Jen is that she is never afraid to say her opinion about something, even if she knows the result will not be favorable. She is opinionated, fair, honest and honestly believes in her views and opinions," Leyton said.

Butler has also contributed to student life at the University through her work with ACE. She joined ACE her junior year and became Traditions chairperson at the end of the fall semester. Butler planned several events, mostly Chrysalis and Siblings Weekend.

"Through her involvement, she has contributed to student life at Bucknell. Not only has she, I believe, really enjoyed her Bucknell experience, but she has worked to make sure that others students also have a great Bucknell experience," ACE Adviser Carolyn Strickland said.

Butler later joined BU After Dark's committee (Late Night Programming Committee). According to Butler, BU After Dark was originally created as a response to the student desire for more activities, occurring later at night.

Butler poses in the Bucky the Bison costume. Wearing the costume was one of her goals while at the University, which she accomplished when she acted as the mascot during BU After Dark, an event she helped plan.

"We listened and modified our ideas by student input and we've created a highly successful, continuing event," Butler said.

Butler has worked very closely with the BU After Dark Committee since the event's inception.

"She has been so committed to its success that she even volunteered to wear the Bison outfit. I think she made a great mascot," Strickland said.

Butler said that overall she enjoyed being Bucky the Bison.

"It sure was hot and sweaty in there, but it was on my 'to-do list' while here, and I did it!" Butler said.

Butler has shown this same dedication and responsibility as a member of the University Concert Chorale.

"As the person in charge of publicity for the Concert Chorale, Jen has been a tremendous help with many of the organizational aspects associated with this group of 60 singers, as well as making arrangements for posters and advertising for our Weis Center concerts," Professor and Director of Choral Studies William Payn said.

Butler admitted that she sometimes feels overwhelmed, but said she only does things she enjoys.

"My biggest challenge has been knowing when to say, 'No.' There are so many things I wish I could have tried. I've learned you have to know your boundaries. It's difficult to choose which activities to pursue and still challenge yourself academically," Butler said.

Butler has not allowed her involvement with extracurricular activities to get in the way of her academics. She is an elementary education major and has fulfilled the requirements for a bachelor of arts in psychology. Butler has also made the Dean's List many times.

In fact, VanGinhoven feels that Butler's involvement has strengthened her academics.

"She has emerged beyond belief, rising in leadership for every activity and organization that caught her slightest attention. However, her extensive involvement in extracurricular activities did not slow her path of academic excellence," VanGinhoven said. "Instead, it strengthened the structure of her schedule and allowed continued success while building her leadership abilities, gaining further trust, respect and loyalty on campus."

Best friend Nicole Chabot '03 echoed VanGinhoven's thoughts.

"Jen is one of the most dedicated people to her academics I have met at Bucknell. She is repeatedly on Dean's List and makes every effort to get as much out of every class possible. She has absolutely made the most out of her academic experience at Bucknell. On top of this, she has found time and energy to immerse herself in student activities and give back to the University," Chabot said.

In any spare time that she has, Butler loves to laugh, watch movies and be with friends.

"She is the most true and honest person I know and impresses me every day with her dedication to people and things she loves. She knows what she wants and likes and what she doesn't and never strays from her determination to live a life true to herself," Chabot said.

Butler is currently interviewing for a teaching position at an elementary school and would eventually like to become a principal.

"I think that Jen is leaving Bucknell fully prepared to enter the work world and that she will be an excellent representation of Bucknell," Strickland said.

Conrad is also confident that Butler will use her qualities to succeed in life.

"She is gifted and talented in so many ways and is able to manage to take on so many things always performing in quality fashion. When Jen walks into a room, it automatically changes, she brightens it up and adds so much to the atmosphere. Jen knows what she wants out of life. She has set goals for herself and will without a doubt succeed in meeting them," Conrad said.

Butler originally came to the University because it was similar to her hometown of Moorestown, N.J., and has found her time here to be everything she hoped for in a college experience.

"I don't think I've had one bad experience. It's been a little piece of heaven and I'll miss it so much," Butler said.

> "I don't think I've had one bad experience."
> —Jennifer Butler '03

As a result of her good experiences, Butler has much pride in the University.

"Waking up to Bucknell's magnificent campus every morning for the past four years has been a dream come true. I feel tremendously blessed to be a Bucknell family member for life. I'm proud to be a Bucknellian," Butler said.

Conrad said she believes that pride will remain a part of Butler.

"She is truly a Bucknellian committed to all that Bucknell stands for. I am confident that Jen will be involved in Bucknell's future as she has been such an integral part of the Bucknell present," Conrad said.

Tom Gadd

FORMER HEAD FOOTBALL COACH

Former Head Football Coach Tom Gadd passed away in his Lewisburg home on March 1, 2003 after a lengthy battle with brain cancer. Gadd, who was a week away from his 56th birthday, was a beloved member of the University community during his seven years at the helm of the football program.

While his accomplishments on the field were legendary, Gadd will probably be best remembered for his leadership, enthusiasm and energy, as well as for the work ethic and values that he instilled on his players.

Gadd began his career at the University in 1994, taking over as head coach of a football program that had only had one winning season in the previous 14 years. His magic touch was evident immediately, as he led the team to a 7-4 record in his first season and a Patriot League Championship in his second year.

Over the course of his career with the Bison, the team never had a losing record and strung together seven consecutive winning seasons for the first time in the program's history.

In 1997, he guided the squad to the only 10-win season in the University's history, which was good enough to merit a national top-20 ranking. During the same year, Gadd was named Patriot League Coach of the Year, and was also a finalist for the Eddie Robinson Award for Division I-AA Coach of the Year.

During the 2001 season, Gadd joined Bob Curtis in a tie for the most victories under a Bucknell coach with 48 wins. He was also the fastest coach in University history to reach that plateau.

While his accomplishments on the field were legendary, Gadd will probably be best remembered for his leadership, enthusiasm and energy, as well as for the work ethic and values that he instilled on his players. He went out of his way to contact and stay in touch with alumni of the football program, helping previous players stay close to the team.

Gadd graduated from University of California-Riverside in 1970, where he also began his coaching career as a defensive coordinator from 1972-1973. Over the next several years he contributed to programs at Long Beach State, University of Utah, University of South Carolina, where his Gamecocks where ranked as high as second in the nation in 1984, University of Minnesota and San Jose State University.

He then joined the Bucknell's program, immediately finding his niche in the University and Lewisburg communities. Gadd, an enthusiastic supporter of all Bucknell athletics, earned the respect of his players, fellow coaches and everyone else whose lives he touched.

Gadd was initially diagnosed with a brain tumor in January 2001, and although the tumor was successfully removed, it returned in the summer of 2002, rendering him unable to coach the team.

His competitive spirit and fortitude were evident in his hard-fought battle with cancer, just as they were in his storied coaching career.

Danna Frangione

DANCE PROGRAM FOUNDER

"Danna was a poet.

Associate Professor of Theatre and Dance Danna Frangione, director of the University's dance program for 14 years, passed away on Dec. 5, 2002.

Over 200 people, including relatives, colleagues and students, attended Frangione's memorial service in January, which was entitled, "Remembrance and Celebration." The service focused on remembering the joy Frangione brought into people's lives.

Frangione's husband, Bob Frangione, shared many anecdotes about their life together. Frangione was normally a very shy person, her husband said, but on stage, she was anything but shy. Dance brought out the best in her, and she wanted to bring out the best in dance.

Frangione's colleagues also felt that she had a tremendous impact on them.

"Danna was the most loving and caring person I knew. We worked together, danced together and choreographed together for eight years," Associate Professor of Theatre Er-Dong Hu said. "She was my colleague and my friend. The extent of her impact on my life is immeasurable, and if not for her influence, I would not be who I am today."

In addition to Frangione's wonderful personality, she also was a talented dancer and choreographer. Hired as the University's first director of dance, she shaped the program.

"In her 14 years as director of the dance program, Danna facilitated the renovation of Tustin Gym into a magnificent dance studio ... designed and guided the successful implementation of a dance minor degree—which soundly balances theory and practice—served as the artistic director of 26 Bucknell Dance Company concerts and introduced the studio concert and choreographer's showcase as new dance venues," Associate Professor of Theatre Bob Gainer said.

"She was my colleague and my friend. The extent of her impact on my life is immeasurable, and if not for her influence, I would not be who I am today."

Frangione also added to the University's curriculum with a foundation and capstone seminar.

Prior to joining the University in 1987, Frangione taught at the University of Georgia, the University of Mississippi and South Dakota State University. Several of her colleagues from Georgia attended the memorial service.

"Danna was a poet," Frangione's former University of Georgia student Peggy Thrasher Law said at the service. "Her language was movement."

Lewis Hendricks Jr. passed away on Nov. 7, 2002, after serving as mayor of Lewisburg for over 30 years. He was 75.

Hendricks served on the Lewisburg Borough Council from 1970-77, acting as council president from 1972-76. He was mayor of Lewisburg from 1978-1993 and from 1996 until his death. Hendricks was also a council member from 1996-1997.

"... [he was] welcoming, helpful, good-humored and dedicated to the betterment of the borough."
—Wayne Bromfield, general council*

Hendricks was a Wal-Mart greeter and worked for Pennsylvania Power and Light (PPL) before retiring in 1990.

Over the past decades, Hendricks devoted substantial time to the development of Lewisburg's police department, encouraging training, updated technology and the overall modernization of the police force.

Police Chief William Neitz Jr. met Hendricks in 1973. Hendricks was on the hiring board when Neitz began working with the police department. According to Neitz, Hendricks helped to improve the technology of the police department.

"He was the biggest advocate of the police department and he was our best friend. He was upbeat on every thing he did," Neitz said.

According to Peter Bergonia, University utilities supervisor and Ward 3 Representative of the Borough Council, Hendricks always had Lewisburg as his focus and helped out whenever he could. Bergonia also believes Hendricks looked to improve the relationship between the University and the town.

"He was looking at communication to be better between the town and students. Students are here and we have to work with them," Bergonia said.

Before last year's election, Hendricks told The Bucknellian that he would encourage residents, business, University and borough officials to have quarterly meetings to discuss problems and issues for the benefit of everyone involved.

"Meetings with Bucknell Student Council members, chief of police and mayor would be exceptionally productive for all parties concerned," Hendricks said.

Hendricks, full of energy and dedication, helped orchestrate projects such as the Purple Heart Monument and Sept. 11 remembrances.

As University General Council Wayne Bromfield, who served as judge while Hendricks was mayor and in charge of the Lewisburg Police Department, said, "As a mayor and citizen, he personified his vision of the spirit of Lewisburg—welcoming, helpful, good-humored and dedicated to the betterment of the borough."

Streeter was born in Williamsport in 1916 and graduated summa cum laude from the University with an A.B and honors in English. He did his postgraduate work at Northwestern University, receiving masters and doctoral degrees. He also held an honorary doctorate of human letters that the University awarded him in 1960.

During his undergraduate career at the University, Streeter served as the editor in chief of The Bucknellian and as the president of the Student-Faculty Congress.

His involvement did not stop following his graduation. Streeter served as president of the Bucknell Alumni Club of Chicago, represented the University at the inauguration of four college presidents, received the Bucknell Association Award for Outstanding Loyalty and Service to Bucknell in 1995, and served on the Board of Trustees from 1966 until his death.

Streeter was the University's Commencement speaker in 1969 and returned to teach here in 1988 when he took the position as the Phi Beta Kappa Visiting Scholar.

In addition, Streeter was the editor of Now and Then: A Sesquicentennial Miscellany, a collection of essays for the sesquicentennial celebration that the University had in 1996.

Streeter's career took him to many places. He served as a member of the editorial staff of the Williamsport Sun-Gazette from 1942-47, and was the American adviser to the English department at the Seoul National University in Korea. He was named a visiting professor at the University of Chicago in 1947 and became a full professor in 1958. While at there, Streeter was associate dean of the undergraduate college in 1953 and became dean in 1954. He was also appointed dean of the division of humanities in 1963 and again in 1968.

In article that appeared in the Chicago Sun-Times in June, the present dean of the graduate division of humanities at the University of Chicago credits Streeter with taking "the first steps toward what today is described as globalization and diversity." He finished his 39-year career in Illinois as the Edward L. Ryerson Distinguished Service Professor of Literature at Chicago University.

Margaret Ann "Peg" Emery, a member of the University's custodial staff for approximately two years, passed away on March 23, 2003. She was 59.

Working at private homes and for the University in Smith Hall and Spratt House, Emery was well-liked among colleagues, employers and even the students living on the halls she cleaned.

Custodial Section Supervisor of the Lower Campus Roger Snook was Emery's immediate supervisor at the University. Snook said Emery was not just a good worker but also a good friend.

"She was always concerned about people. She loved to sit and watch people."

"A lot of times you get people who are just peers and coworkers but Peg wanted to be a friend as well as a coworker," Snook said. "She was always concerned about people. She loved to sit and watch people."

People who knew Emery agreed that she was an individual.

"She was a very private person. Peg walked her own way and it made her the good person that she was. She never followed any cliques," Snook said.

Nonetheless, Emery was a friendly woman who enjoyed working with students, and one who took pride in what she accomplished.

Robert E. Smith '39

DONOR AND TRUSTEE

Smith and his wife were great benefactors of the University, donating $8 million in February 2002 to fund the Recreation and Athletic Center.

BY JOLENE HART
Senior Editor

Robert E. Smith '39 died unexpectedly of an aneurysm on May 14, 2002. Born in 1917, Smith graduated from the University with a degree in economics. As a student, he was a member of Kappa Sigma Fraternity and the University's varsity basketball team. Smith married alumna Margaret "Peg" Farrell '41 in 1942.

"Bob was a classic servant-leader. Everywhere he went ... people asked him to lead, and he always obliged. In every case, his goal was institutional improvement rather than personal aggrandizement."
—Gary Sojka, professor of biology*

Beginning his career selling Rayon yarn for the American Viscose Corporation, Smith joined Chemstrand Corporation in 1948 and became vice president of national and international marketing. In 1977, Smith took over as president of the Beaunit Corporation, which was instrumental in the development of Acrilan and Astroturf. He taught marketing and established an extension program for North Carolina State University from 1968-70 before retiring in 1985.

Smith joined the University Board of Trustees in 1982 and was elected chairman emeritus in 1988. He also served on the Bucknell Development Council and the Bison Club. Smith Hall was named in honor of Smith and his wife in 1987.

Smith received the Bucknell Alumni Association Award for Outstanding Loyalty and Service in 1990 and 1997 and the Alumni Achievement Award in 2002, which honors former Bucknell athletes who have gained special distinction in their careers.

Smith and his wife were great benefactors of the University, donating $8 million in February 2002 to fund the Recreation and Athletic Center. The donation is the University's largest single charitable gift to date.

According to Bucknell World, "Smith's donation was fostered by a desire to have a first-class facility for student recreation and athletics, in particular a top-notch basketball arena."

Shortly before his death, Smith said, "I happened to play in the first basketball game ever played in Davis Gym, and I thought at the time it was Utopia, because our previous games had all been played in the old Tustin Gym. Tustin had a running track around it, and you had to round off the corners of the basketball court because of the track. Bucknell rarely lost a home game in those days, because there wasn't another court like it anywhere. It led Bucknell to develop the first three-out, two-back zone defense. Now here we are, 60-some years later, and look where we've come."

The Smiths selected Gary Sojka, former University president and professor of biology, as the namesake for the University's new basketball pavilion.

"Bob was a classic servant-leader. Everywhere he went—at Bucknell, his condo association in Florida, the Burr and Burton Academy in Vermont—people asked him to lead, and he always obliged. In every case, his goal was institutional improvement rather than personal aggrandizement," Sojka said.

Richard George Iskandar, a University junior, passed away on Dec. 20, 2002 at Geisinger Medical Center in Danville, where he had been hospitalized because of serious complications of a long-term medical condition.

Iskandar, a fine student who had been active in many student organizations, was well-respected and held in great affection by people who knew him.

"My hallmates and I soon found about his failing kidneys and the need for dialysis, to which one's supposed reaction should be pity and remorse. But Richie made it difficult for us to feel sorry for him; he had more life in him than any person I know," close friend Rob Schmicker '02 said. "Conversations became livelier when he entered the room and he never had negative things to say about anyone. Whenever we had a problem, we could talk to Richie and somehow he was able to put it in perspective because of his wonderful understanding of life. He was an amazing listener and friend."

The campus community deeply felt the loss of one of its students.

"Due to the presence of family, visits by many students, faculty and staff from Bucknell, the spiritual ministrations offered to him by several church communities with which he was in fellowship, and the careful attention of Geisinger medical personnel, he made his departure from this world well cared for and supported," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said in a campuswide e-mail notification of Iskandar's passing.

Hoyle became a member of the University community as a physician in 1962. In 1981, after nearly 19 years as an associate physician in the Student Medical Service, he became the medical director of the University Student Health Service. He was instrumental in initiating several campus medical programs such as the AIDS Task Force.

"As a result of this committee, the Pennsylvania Department of Health comes to campus on a regular basis to administer HIV testing. He was also instrumental in creating the Student Health Service Advisory Committee which prompted changes at the Student Health Service, such as the availability for prescription medication to be purchased at the health center and providing courier service for patients' laboratory specimens to Evangelical Community Hospital for analysis," Health Service Assistant Director Nancy Shuck said.

Developing the University's first alcohol and drug program, Hoyle sought better public health education, including treatment of alcohol and drug addiction.

"He was a kind and compassionate man who cared deeply about his family, colleagues, students, and patients. He had a pleasant personality and a great sense of humor," said Bob Thomas, coordinator of drug and alcohol programs at Bucknell.

Since his arrival in Lewisburg, Hoyle was a leader in the community. He served as medical consultant to the Union County Prison, deputy coroner and school physician for Lewisburg elementary schools.

Throughout his life, Hoyle had a special fondness for the medicine of children and young adults. He volunteered his services as a physician for the county's Well Baby Clinic and Head Start Program. He was also a member of the board of trustees of Evangelical Hospital, a delegate to the Pennsylvania Medical Society, a deacon and trustee to the First Presbyterian Church of Lewisburg and a board member of the Lewisburg Listening Post.

After working for the National Institutes for Health, Hoyle attended the University of Pittsburgh and received his degree as a medical doctor in 1957. After medical school, he served in the U.S. Army as a captain in the medical corps. Hoyle moved his family to Lewisburg in 1962 to begin his private practice of obstetric and pediatric medicine as well as serve the University's student medical service.

Hoyle leaves behind his wife of 51 years, June, and three children including Susan Hoyle-Fournier '88.

John Wilkins '80

ISR SYSTEMS INTEGRATOR

During his tenure, Wilkins' talents ... were significant assets both to ISR and to his colleagues.

BY JENNIFER JENCHURA
Senior Writer

John Wilkins '80, employed at the University for the past eight years as a Systems Integrator for Information Services and Resources (ISR), passed away on Jan. 13, 2003 after a 14-year battle with cancer. During his tenure, Wilkins' talents as a cryptography expert, security professional, programmer and UNIX system administrator were significant assets both to ISR and to his colleagues.

"Wilkins has a long history at Bucknell, both as a student and as a member of the staff. In his work life, John spent a great deal of his time working on large systems that work behind the scenes in ISR. Our use of the dial-in modems, e-mail, listserv lists, Web services and Banner all depended on John's careful attention. He was also one of our primary security experts," Associate Vice President for ISR Gene Spencer said.

Although Wilkins was unable to come to the office during much of his last year, he continued to work from home.

"His unique and exceptional combination of personality, technical skills, creative intellect and interests was something that I'll always remember fondly and most likely will be a standard against which I'll unintentionally compare all other of my close colleagues in the future," ISR Systems Integrator Chris Weber said. "Our brainstorming sessions and technical discussions, non-work-related conversations, projects we shared, the constant bloom of humor in the office, and our easy relationship combined into something that, frankly, was my primary source of job satisfaction during John's term of employment here."

For the nine years prior to returning to the University as an employee, Wilkins was an advisory engineer to IBM's Cryptography Center of Competence in Manassas, Va. While there, he was named as an inventor in 18 patents in the areas of data security, multimedia copy protection and network analysis. Wilkins was also the founder and owner of Petra Security Architects, a consulting firm for computer and network security, and a founder and co-owner of WellChildForms, Inc., an Internet company providing customized well-child forms to pediatricians and family physicians.

"Those who knew John will remember him for his uncommon and quiet courage, great faith, capable intellect and welcome wit."
—Chris Weber, ISR Systems Integrator*

An amateur radio operator for over a decade, Wilkins enjoyed running, biking, hiking and cross-country skiing. Wilkins was a member of the Mifflinburg Christian and Missionary Alliance Church.

"John was an active participant in Bucknell's Christian community and he and his family often opened their home to many students from that community. I've heard many stories of groups of students meeting at their house to share a meal, share fellowship and escape the campus for just a little bit," Spencer said.

According to friends, Wilkins was always willing to share his considerable knowledge, ideas and well-considered opinions with anyone who might ask.

"Those who knew John will remember him for his uncommon and quiet courage, great faith, capable intellect and welcome wit," Weber said.

In the past year, our community has suffered a number of losses, from coaches to custodians. The Bucknellian honors their memory.

Senior Reflections

With four years under our belts, we seniors have experienced a great deal of commotion: political, economic, military and sentimental. From the great flood, where the University gave free housing and meals to flooded residents, to the Iraqi War, where we've held protests and support groups, we have come together as a community despite our differences. This is a timeline of the major campus events the Class of 2003 will hold in its memories.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The end. A finish line I have been dreading since my first month on campus. It seemed so far away in 1999, but something happened along the way. Four years at Bucknell passed in the blink of an eye and, looking back, it has been a roller coaster ride to remember forever.

My first day was a wet one. I remember leaving my home on Long Island on a sunny morning and beginning the first of many trips west on interstate 80 towards Lewisburg. The car was full of my possessions and family and we traveled in relative silence to see where the road would lead us.

As the rains began to fall, a sense of dread and fear crept up on me. I was frightened of the road ahead and the rain was only making things worse. To add insult to injury, as we turned onto Route 45 only a few miles from campus, my bike fell off the car and I had to fix it in the pouring rain.

After moving in, watching my dad retrieve the car from a flood and a long goodbye in the rain next to Taylor Hall, I watched my family drive away and I remember feeling very alone and wet, not from the rain but from tears streaming down my face. What was going to happen? Who would I meet? How would I get through this?

Over time, those fears became useless. My parents did come back (especially once my sister decided to play volleyball here), I found friends in many places and created for myself a life I could not have imagined on that rainy day in 1999.

Four years seems like such a long time when you are sitting in high school or packing for the move to college. Those four years have passed in, pardon the expression, a New York minute. When I was leaving campus after my first semester, I thought about the one down, seven to go thing. Now it is eight down. Amazing.

Four years have held some amazing times. We lived though an amazing flood, the election of 2000 (listening to the chaos through one speaker in The Bucknellian's office, the nightmare of Sept. 11, Operation Iraqi Freedom. We saw Bro Adams move on to Colby College and Stef Rodgers arrive.

Our campus saw an immense amount of construction—O'Leary, McDonnell Hall, the Kenneth Langone Athletic Center, the Weis Music Building, a new cafeteria, Coleman renovations, Hunt renovations, Vedder renovations, etc. Physical Plant (which employs some of the best and most underrated employees at this school) dug countless holes (Is it in the bylaws somewhere that there must always be a big, steaming hole on campus?).

Bucknell will always be special to me—and ultimately my family—in so many ways. I have a sister here who will one day share a special bond with me. I have parents who love Bucknell and all it stands for. I have an aunt and uncle who love this place and will remain even when my sister and I are long gone. Perhaps more than anything else, though, I have a diverse circle of friends that I owe many things to. They taught me how to learn, live, laugh and enjoy life. In reality, they changed me completely and opened my eyes up to a world I was missing. For that, I am forever grateful.

As I walk across the stage on May 18 and move away, I will forever be in awe of this place. I will never forget the sunsets, the cherry trees on the quad or the way campus looks under a fresh coat of snow. The people here will also be a fond memory—professors, staff and good friends are irreplaceable and are what helped to make this experience all it could be.

When I give my tours people ask me all the time, 'What is the best thing about Bucknell?' The real answer came to me the other day at 5:32. The echoes of our alma mater through campus brought it all home. It is the people and the memories they leave, etched in the mind, of the four best years a person could have.

Trying to capture four years worth of memories in a 700-word essay is, I imagine, a little like setting out to "clean" the streets of Lewisburg. You know you're going to fail. You can only hope that somebody, somewhere, will appreciate the effort.

So here goes.

I don't mind telling you that I had something of a rough start at Bucknell. I didn't make many friends at first. In fact, I never even had a second conversation with the first person I ever met here—and the kid lived across the hall. I felt alienated from my peers for a thousand different reasons—most of them stupid. I was self-conscious about being a non-athlete on a hall full of varsity athletes. I didn't drink. I didn't care for parties. I read in my spare time. I often went to bed before midnight. I ate a lot of salad.

They thought I was weird, and they were probably right.

Fortunately, over time I settled in. And though academics have always been important to me, I can honestly say that most of my personal growth stemmed from my involvement in activities outside the classroom. God provided a number of unique opportunities, and He worked through each of them to teach me something new and help me mature. It's amazing. It's as though I can look back, point to every one of them in turn, and clearly identify just how I benefited and grew from being involved in each.

As a member of the Community Judicial Board, for example, I learned how to make difficult, unpleasant decisions that directly impacted the lives of others.

Through years of writing opinions for The Bucknellian and The Counterweight, I learned the importance of civility and respect in the presentation of your views. I learned how to take what is in my head and express it in a way that makes sense to the rest of the world, and when I failed to do that, I learned how to handle criticism. I learned to compromise, to work within deadlines and, on a few occasions, even learned the joy that comes when a person you respect tells you "job well done."

From my involvement with the Fellowship of Christian Athletes, I learned that leadership is all about sacrifice and service. In the process I had tons of fun, made dozens of friends and learned the importance of patience, compassion and forgiveness in my Christian walk. Plus I discovered four-square. That was pretty huge, too.

Of course, college isn't about the stuff you do—it's about the people you do it with. I've met some truly amazing people these last four years.

To my professors: Thank you for teaching me—not just information, but how to think.

To the rising leadership of the groups and causes I hold dear (and you know who you are): Stay strong. Play fair. Think big. And as Pythagoras once said, "Rest satisfied with doing well, and leave others to talk of you as they please." I know that you'll make Bucknell a better place.

To all the friends I've made along the way: Thanks for the good times. I did not deserve you. Sal, you've been an awesome roommate. Three years out of four without killing each other … that's not bad. Hey, I have an idea. Why don't we get married? We could live together for the rest of our lives.

I can't speak for every senior, but personally, I stare at May 18 on that calendar and I'm a jumble of emotions.

I can't speak for every senior, but personally, I stare at May 18 on that calendar and I'm a jumble of emotions. I'm proud and nervous and excited and sad and thrilled and worried and more than a little bit dazed by how quickly it all went.

I know Bucknell isn't perfect. But it was good to me, it was good for me and I'm confident that my experiences here have helped prepared me for a happy, productive future out there in the real world.

The Class of 2003

"My favorite Bucknell memory occurred when we scored with nine seconds left against American in the semi-finals of the Patriot League soccer tournament my junior year. That win put us into the championship game against Navy, and so when my teammate, Emily Keber '03, scored … the entire team sprinted down the field and piled on top of her despite the fact that there was still time on the clock. Then we beat Navy in overtime to become the first Bucknell women's soccer team to ever win a P.L. Championship. It was such a great feeling to win those games for our team and for Bucknell … and it is a memory that I will never ever forget."
Laurie Purse

"The night before classes freshman year, anticipating my four years ahead—hard to believe they are already over!"
Jennifer Hoek

"On those quiet days when no one was around campus, I loved sitting on the 'Sunset Strip' of the quad to watch the sun go down."
Michele Kawood

"… The stupidity of our behavior freshman year: 'room parties,' trying (usually unsuccessfully) to get into parties, becoming instant friends with 20-plus people and the general mayhem."
Brendan Putnam

"Winning the 2001 Patriot League Championship for women's soccer … and playing Penn State in the NCAA Tournament."
Kate Cramer

"Nothing beats the 'freshman flood.' I only regret sleeping through it to hear about the great tidal wave the next morning."

In various contexts throughout my four years at Bucknell, I have been asked an array of questions along the same theme: "Why Bucknell?" "What makes this school unique?" "Why did you come here?" "What do you like most?" etc., etc. It seems as though the inquirers unrealistically expect a concise, cut and dry response. But the first thing I learned at Bucknell was that nothing in life is black and white—it isn't even shades of gray.

Instead, I find life to be colorful, vibrant and ever-changing. As such, life poses a kaleidoscope of challenges, triumphs and setbacks for which one can never be fully prepared. Thanks to my experience at the University, as I graduate and enter the next phase of my life, I feel as prepared as possible!

In my four years here, I formed relationships with friends on deeper levels than I thought possible. Members of my sorority and other friends became family to me. Several colleagues, professors and administrators became role models and inspirations.

From the Alpha Chi Omega sisterhood, I learned the importance of unity and service for the greater good. From my closest friends, I discovered the virtues of generosity, patience and laughter. I developed the skills of multitasking from Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad and the balancing of responsibilities from Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70. The admissions office staff demonstrated to me the enormity of what can be accomplished through teamwork. My international relations and French professors instilled in me an enhanced appreciation for multiculturalism, understanding of varying ideologies and promotion of diversity. Professors like William Gruver, Emek Ucarer and Tony Massoud challenged me to higher standards of learning, both independent and collective. My colleagues in the Bucknell Student Government reaffirmed my values of consistent ethics, compromise and tenacity. The list of skills, values and knowledge learned at the University continues endlessly. For, the University, in its entirety, afforded me the opportunities to discover who I truly am. It is at the University, through countless relationships in varying contexts, that I found myself.

For the joy of self-exploration, intellectual pursuits, moral growth and lifelong relationships, I am so proud to be a Bucknellian. Thank you to everyone who contributed to affording me a well-rounded education.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

In theory, I like to think myself a Bucknell curmudgeon—a Bucknellian against Bucknellians, a theoretical misanthrope, a remote senior who will unfeelingly move on.

In practice, I am none of these. And I will not unfeelingly move on. My theories fall: I like my experience of Bucknell.

When I began to edit The Bucknellian as a sophomore, Jim Lee, our adviser, met with me each week. There, in addition to exchanging thoughts on the newspaper, we discussed student apathy and arrogance, the prevalence and damaging effects of Greek life, frustration and—yes—opportunity.

As a senior, I can state with confidence bolstered through experience: Bucknell is rife with opportunity.

If I could leave a message based on my experience here, it would be directed to those who feel, as I did at first, that they might not fit the Bucknell ethos. To those who, like me, have felt detached from Bucknell's central social scene, to those who have considered transfer: Bucknell holds abundant opportunities for the "atypical" Bucknellian—whose numbers are steadily increasing.

How can someone feel nurtured and stimulated at Bucknell, both socially and intellectually, without glimpsing the inside of a frat house?

The question has been answered by hundreds of students, in hundreds of ways, over the span of Bucknell's existence.

It was answered, for me, through interning for West Branch, a national literary magazine based at Bucknell. It was answered when—as an idealistic sophomore—I proposed a Bucknell-sponsored undergraduate academic conference to the administration, and the administration listened.

They did not approve, but they listened.

The question was answered as Professor of English Harold Schweizer pretended to play a miniature violin during a party at Professor of English Michael Payne's house. It was answered as Chair of the English Department John Rickard's dog Bruno sang along with "Ave Maria" during a James Joyce seminar held in his family room.

As the Humanities Residential College painted murals, rode buses to New York City and stayed overnight in Washington, D.C., the question was, again, answered.

During concerts by the University's Concert Chorale, during lectures by Jane Goodall, Richard Dawkins and Toni Morrison, the question was answered resoundingly. When Bucknell encouraged my honors thesis, a collection of short fiction, when I read translations with Russian poet Olga Sedakova and worked on a collaborative poem with Stadler Intern Professor Ron Mohring, the question was—over and over—answered.

It was answered day by day, hour by hour, countless times, during my years here. And my experience was no anomaly. I've learned not to be so negative—the face of Bucknell is malleable. It is molded by our desires for it.

In theory, Bucknell and The Bucknellian are a moderate-to-conservative institution and an institution-sponsored newspaper: nothing to seek out, appreciate or miss when I have gone.

I repeatedly stumble on that fissure between theory and practice.

In practice, I've learned that Bucknell's social, academic and compositional identity has evolved during my years here. As Bucknell continues to question its approach to Greek life and its dedication to its so-called traditions, its face will inevitably—and, I believe, beneficially—shift.

I could conclude my message, then, by advising students who feel atypical to help further that shift—by remaining at Bucknell.

I could conclude by thanking my professors whose company and teaching is unparalleled, who have become friends, and who feel like family. I could thank those who support the Residential Colleges. I could thank those involved with Bucknell's fine English department.

Or I could thank the passing anonymous Bucknellian who mooned me tonight as I walked to the Langone Center.

I could thank this Bucknellian because, after all, a would-be misanthrope needs practical fodder for her disdain. A would-be misanthrope needs, in practice, a cause to smile. I've seen the backside of Bucknell. I've also seen its face.

I have seen, finally, that Bucknell possesses as many backsides and faces as it does opportunities. It is home to curmudgeons, apathetics and arrogants. It is a shape-shifter. I am glad to have stayed to know its several shapes. I am grateful to have shifted shapes within it.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

With graduation fast approaching, I think it is only natural to look back and reflect on the last four years of my life at Bucknell. I honestly don't know how much of what I've learned in the classroom will be necessary in the future. I don't know whether or not the Bucknell name is going to help me get ahead in life. But I do know one thing—I know I will take the memories of the amazing experiences I have had here at the University with me wherever I go, for the rest of my life.

Ralph Waldo Emerson once said, "The best effect of fine persons is felt after we have left their presence." As I prepare to leave this place and the many wonderful people I have met here, I am already beginning to feel the mark that each and every one of them has left upon me.

Bucknell has always been a part of my life. My parents went here, my sister goes here and my family lives in Lewisburg. I know I will be coming back. But it will not be the same. Despite the beauty of the campus and the integrity of the University's character, the real Bucknell, for me, lies within the friendships I have made and the lessons I have learned, both inside the classroom and out.

The wonderful group of faculty and staff members with whom I have interacted has made my experience here especially enjoyable. I don't think there are a lot of other universities where you can travel to a professor's house for class, or watch a documentary that a professor has recently made herself or read poetry underneath the cherry tree in the president's backyard.

Another aspect of my college career that has been extremely rewarding is my job in the Personnel Office. The wonderful group of staff members there has given me the confidence and experience to go on to my next job, though I have been a little spoiled—I think I will expect a birthday party and an end-of-the-year luncheon in my future jobs as well.

Bucknell has also provided me with many opportunities to get involved in student activities on campus. I will always be grateful to the people I have met through my involvement with Fire and Ice and the Spirits of Praise choir. And I will especially miss the wonderful times I had working on The Bucknellian. I owe a lot to the entire staff, especially Rachel Laskow '03 and Jason Rubinstein '04, for showing me that writing is especially fulfilling when working with creative, fun individuals.

Recently, a friend asked me what my favorite Bucknell memory was. It gave me a great deal of pleasure not to be able to answer her. There are just too many wonderful memories to choose one. From House Parties to football games to Candlelighting, each of these events has contributed to my college experience. I want to thank my friends, especially my roommates, for showing me how wonderful college can be, Kendra for carrying on the family tradition and Melinda Kummer '05 for making Arts & Entertainment the most fun section of the paper (in my humble opinion).

I don't know where I will be in a year, or five years, or 20 years, but I do know that Bucknell, and especially the friends I am privileged to have met here, will remain in my heart forever.

Telling it like it is ...

A few weeks ago, I was in Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock's '70 office interviewing him for one last Bucknellian article. When the interview was over, he asked me about my future and as I left he told me that one of the hardest parts about being an administrator is forming relationships with students and then having them graduate. I thought about what he said for a few minutes and realized that the hardest part about being a Bucknell student is not the classes I've taken or the endless hours I've spent in The Bucknellian office trying to put together a paper. Instead, the hardest part is knowing that those experiences and the people I've met from them will not be a part of my everyday life forever.

I do not think that there are too many people at other schools who can say they have been out to lunch with a dean and vice president, have had class at a professor's house, have interviewed the president, have attended a press conference with Janet Reno and have met the chairman of the Board of Trustees. Although most of those opportunities happened because I was editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian, they also happened because I was able to make the best out of my Bucknell experience.

I came to Bucknell a shy freshman, not knowing what I wanted to get out of my four years of college. I started out by writing for the newspaper. By the beginning of my sophomore year I was a layout editor and by the second half of my junior year, I was editor-in-chief. I truly believe that the newspaper allowed me to find my place at Bucknell. Being editor-in-chief taught me more about myself and life than I could have learned in any classroom. Yes, my professors taught me to challenge myself and think critically, but being editor-in-chief prepared me for my future. I learned despite missing articles, staff conflicts and hours of homework, I had to put out a paper and that paper had to be the best I could possibly make it. If I settled for less, not only would I be letting our readers down, but I would be letting myself down.

Another rewarding experience that I've had here is being a teaching assistant (TA) for "baby bio" for four semesters. At our first meeting this semester, all of the TAs went around the room and said their names and majors. When it was my turn and I said that I was an English and Spanish major, everybody stopped and laughed at me. One TA even jokingly told me I was in the wrong place. That's what I love about Bucknell—the fact that I can be an English and Spanish major and still have the opportunity to TA for a biology class is something that I don't think I could have done at many other colleges.

This past week, I TAed for the last time, I went to my last Editorial Board meeting, wrote my last Bucknellian article and spent my last Wednesday night in The Bucknellian office. Next week I will attend my last class, write my last paper and finish my last homework assignment. These past four years have seen many disappointments, many mistakes, many improvements and many hopes for the future. We lived through the tragedy of Sept. 11, 2001, but were able to remain strong and united as a Bucknell family. We witnessed the blackface incident, but learned from the mistake and in turn have increased diversity awareness on campus. We experienced overcrowding in dorms and a rundown gym, but the problems were solved with a new dorm and new athletic center. As I write this, we see Bucknell continue to move into the future by installing new technology such as wireless Internet.

My friends often laugh at me because when we walk outside, I always run into somebody I know—whether it's a Bucknellian staff member, one of my residents from when I was a CHOICE Fellow, a professor or an administrator. It is those people who I will miss seeing every day, even if it was just to say a friendly "hello" or give a quick smile. Those people, along with my friends, have truly made my Bucknell experience wonderful. Also, I would like to thank The Bucknellian Adviser Jim Lee for giving me support and ideas throughout my years on the paper. Sandi-Jo Galati '04 has provided me a great friendship and I thank her for her constant dedication to the newspaper. Most importantly, I would like to thank Jason Rubinstein '04 for being a wonderful friend and for forcing me to think outside of the box. Jason challenged me to become a better editor-in-chief, and in turn, I became a better person.

On May 18, 2003, I will experience my last Bucknell event as a student and see all of my friends together for the last time in the place we've called home for the past four years. Although I do not know what my future will bring, I am confident that my Bucknell experience has prepared me to face any challenges I will face.

With a word of caution to those who may dare to read this: This article is sappy, sentimental and talks about my grandmother. It is important to me, of course, but for those who are looking for my own special blend of comedy and intrigue, you won't find it here. Check the sports section. This article is about growth, a bildungsroman du jour of Aaron and the blue hat. So sit back, enjoy the tale and maybe you'll learn something.

P.S. The picture above is me eating the Dorito on the side of the truck. It speaks to the nature of humankind ... know it, love it, live it.

When I started high school my grandmother was sick. She had had a stroke, and then was diagnosed with lung cancer. She was getting chemotherapy and the doctors gave her a few months to live—I told them all she would see me graduate. My brother had left for college the year before and I was just finally getting to enjoy the "last child left" syndrome. I got the front seat in the car, the snacks I wanted from the grocery store, and dinner conversations were either about me or at the very least, it was me asking the questions.

When my grandmother moved in with us, it was hard to adjust. All those privileges seemed to disappear and my family seemed mentally and physically taxed.

Around the same time, I began wearing a hat. I wore it everywhere. In fact, the only place I didn't wear my hat was at meals. My grandmother used to tell me to take my hat off at the dinner table. At the beginning, I couldn't understand what she was trying to say, her stroke had impaired her ability to form clear sentences, and the heavy phlegm getting caught in her throat from years of smoking ... I would just stare at her, head cocked, trying to decipher her gesticulations until she would finally lean over with her thin, smooth fingers and yank my hat off and blurt out, clear as day, "No hats!"

Four years later, when I packed up my car for the trip to Lewisburg, before my parents and I hopped in the car, I took my hat off and gave my grandmother a hug and told her I'd be back in a few months. The doctors had nothing on my grandmother and as I slid back into the car and put my cap back on my head, I told my parents she'd see me graduate again.

Bucknell was something I wasn't really ready for. I hadn't liked the University when I made the visit almost a year and a half earlier and, being accepted off the wait list, I hadn't had time to visit again.

My blue Mets cap stepped out at Swartz Hall under a canopy of rain and I still wasn't ready. I walked in and met my roommate for the first time and I still wasn't ready. I took two semesters of work, trying to find a field I was interested in and I still wasn't ready.

I wasn't ready to be known as the "kid in the blue hat" either, but it became a safety net of sorts. It was like Superman putting his glasses back on and becoming Clark Kent. With my hat on I could do anything, and take my hat off and people wouldn't know who I was. It was easy.

So when a friend on my freshman hall asked me to judge the Mr. Bucknell competition, I couldn't do it without my blue hat. And when I began writing poetry for the first time, I couldn't do it without my blue hat. And when I was first asked to read at a poetry slam, I couldn't do it without my blue hat.

But somewhere over my four years at Bucknell my hat stopped becoming an escape. I stopped taking my hat off when I was embarrassed or when people told me it was "odd" or that I was "f---ing stupid" (like that drunken schmoe at formals who was jealous that he couldn't wear a hat at formals—well, I showed him). I stopped taking my hat off when I started realizing I was worth recognizing, and that realization is something that I owe to Bucknell and to all the people I've met here. My hat is the mark I leave on Bucknell and the mark that Bucknell has left on me.

My grandmother passed away after my freshman year at Bucknell—perhaps my second prediction was a little overzealous. Somewhere in the expansive collection of photographs stored in the DeRosa home, there is a picture of my grandmother wearing the wig she wore to cover her chemo-ridden head, and on top of the wig rests my blue hat. It is a reminder to me that life is merely the downtime between times when you make an ass of yourself, and until you embrace your own weaknesses, you're not going anywhere.

Nowadays, when I eat dinner I think about the surprising jolt of strength from a woman who was stronger than I ever dared guess pulling my hat from off my head as I sat down at the table.

When I walk up to receive my diploma you can bet your sweet bippy my tassel will be hanging from a very faded blue Mets baseball cap. But when I sit down for dinner later that night, you can rest assured my hat will be off, maybe for the last time, in memory of a woman that knew how to live, and who gave me the courage to live it myself. Gram, this one's for you.

"Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful and committed citizens can change the world....It's the only thing that ever has." ~"The West Wing"

There is a ceiling tile in Smith 2A that doesn't quite match the others. It is a little whiter, a little out of place. On the same hall, there is a crack in the turquoise light cover over the fire extinguisher. Unnoticeable to the average passerby, these irregularities make me smile. Hypothetically, the tile might blend better into the ceiling of 3A, had its 2A predecessor not been the casualty of a rugby ball. Theoretically, the cracked plastic may have been hastily patched with glue and camouflaged with highlighter after coming in contact with a souvenir Yankees bat.

Answering an e-mail about copy editing for the newspaper is one of the best decisions I have ever made. I've never met a more dedicated, well-intentioned and hysterical group of people than my friends on the Editorial Board.

These may have been the stories I brought home with me for winter break my first semester on campus. Everybody asked me if I liked Bucknell, to which I replied that I loved it. Since then, my answer has changed—I love the friends I have made here.

I like to think of myself as an atypical Bucknellian—I don't drink, I own less than five items from J. Crew and I am not a part of Greek life. A friend said that were I ever intoxicated, I'd be walking the halls naked—onlookers are forever thankful for my alcoholic abstinence. People introduce me at parties with first name, "Andrea," and last name, "She Doesn't Drink." I guess that's important information; therefore, I am essentially useless for the likes of pong and Beirut. But that's OK because I'm a little prissy, and the idea of gulping a drink tainted by a Ping-Pong ball that has bounced in beer sludge isn't exactly appetizing.

Instead of going Greek, I found my niche at The Bucknellian junior year. Answering an e-mail about copy editing for the newspaper is one of the best decisions I have ever made. I've never met a more dedicated, well-intentioned and hysterical group of people than my friends on the Editorial Board.

As the walls literally crumble, the staff is often in the decrepit basement office of Roberts Hall until 3 a.m. to make deadlines. On Fridays, when a new edition of The Bucknellian is available to the campus community, there is often newspaper carnage around the Bison, which is a sight to see for the bleary-eyed staff. Read The Bucknellian. Criticize it. Write a letter to the editor or otherwise contribute. Mine has The Bucknellian—whatever yours is, find a passion worth talking about at the University.

There is often the criticism that students are apathetic. Apathy may be true in some cases, like one junior I talked to who said she had no opinion about Iraq and knew nothing about France's involvement. Hopefully, she is a pathetic anomaly. I have met people whose comments are often not only soporific, but questionably human, and others whose sheer brilliance and level of accomplishment inspire me to be a better person.

I have heard debate about everything: the University's resistance to acting on student input, Israel versus Palestine, the asinine lack of parking, the economic black hole of a football team and even liberal and conservative ideals.

To the professors who have challenged me: Thank you for encouraging me to push further and proving that sometimes discourse does extend outside of the classroom, even for 18th or 19th century Romantic literature course. To the friends who have kept me relatively sane: Thank you for making my last four years immeasurably better with your clever wit, intelligence, idiocy, laughter, compassion and encouragement. To my family: Thank you for putting up with me.

My family first moved me in August 20, 1999. They will watch Commencement on May 18 as the newest University alumni blend together in caps and gowns, each having left an indelible mark. The University is truly an amalgamation of the people, all of whom hopefully leave with stories like "Operation Jack-A-Tile" and how their Elmer's glue finally came in handy. Across campus there are slight scars that represent its true character and spirit, some visible and others not. If nothing else, make sure you leave with blemishes borne of hilarity and passion.

Senior administration under heavy criticism

By Josh Fisher
Section Editor

Several faculty members have ardently criticized the University's senior administration in recent months for lacking leadership abilities, institutional memory and vision. These critics have also expressed fears that higher education has become "commodified," especially at the University.

These faculty claim that in an increasingly competitive industry the persistent calls for operational efficiency, streamlined academic processes and cost reduction measures have transformed the traditional "liberal arts" education into a relic of the past, and that individual career advancement is tending to replace the social, political or moral goals of higher education.

"We are unique and we need to celebrate that fact."

—Steffen Rogers, University president*

Other University community members do not share these fears and claim that "marketing" college education is necessary to deal with current institutional realities, need not be detrimental to the educational experience and instead may offer a greater breadth of courses and a more diverse array of educational opportunities.

Most faculty and administration declined to comment on the morale and leadership of the University.

"We are unique and we need to celebrate that fact," University President Steffen Rogers said.

Rogers said that he does not believe that the University is losing its character in the light of increased competition among universities.

Professor of International Relations and Political Science Tom Travis disagreed with this statement.

"Thirty-three years at Bucknell University and I've never seen so many faculty who are so disenchanted, alienated and distressed about the conditions in the University, and this dissent cuts across the divisions of the University and all faculty ranks," Travis said.

Professor of Geography Environmental Studies Ben Marsh also said that he believes the morale of many members of the University community is suffering.

"In my 25 years [at the University], I have never known the faculty and most of the administration and even the paint crew to be so dramatically disaffected," Marsh said.

Professor of Management John Miller said he believes that this morale crisis is the case at the University and among other universities as well.

"Morale is exceptionally low, and it isn't just Bucknell, it is faculty across the country," Miller said.

"I have been brought to a level of total frustration," Professor of International Relations and Political Science Steve Stamos said, pointing to a crisis in leadership at the University as the source of the morale crisis. "The thing is, nobody cares about anything. At the last faculty meeting there were 80 people there—20 administrators and 60 of 290 faculty, all of whom were senior faculty. It was a depressing turnout."

Professor of Management Timothy Sweeney also said that low faculty morale is evident at the University.

"It seems that faculty are less enthusiastic to attend monthly faculty

Langone '57 accused of securities fraud

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The recreation and athletic center will be dedicated to Kenneth Langone '57 this weekend. Langone's company Invemed is currently under investigation for allegedly overcharging customers for IPOs.

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

University alumnus Kenneth G. Langone '57, who leads as chairman, chief and executive president of Invemed Associates LLC, a small securities firm on Wall Street, has been charged by securities regulators with improperly sharing customer profits by overcharging customers on initial public offerings (IPOs) during 1999 and 2000, according to The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times.

The National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD) claims Invemed Associates violated many NASD rules and NASD is seeking a court order that would require Langone's company to surrender any "improper" IPO profits, according to The Wall Street Journal. The alleged charges accuse Invemed of charging its clients oversized commissions in exchange for IPOs that were expected to be profitable.

According to The New York Times, Invemed inflated the cost of commissions for institutional customers to as high as $8 per share when those customers wanted to quickly sell the IPOs they had purchased. The traditional rate per share is 6 cents, according to The Wall Street Journal.

According to The New York Times, NASD has brought the lawsuit against Invemed Associates as part of a continuing investigation into how companies like Invemed became so successful in the late 1990s.

The Wall Street Journal reported that Langone, who also serves as director on the New York Stock Exchange board, the General Electric Company board and the Home Depot, Inc. board and corporate governance committee, has taken an strong stance to fight the charges against him. Other firms such as the Credit Suisse First Boston unit of the Credit Suisse Group, who faced similar charges, settled by paying fines. The firm did not admit to or deny the charges.

Due to a hectic schedule, Langone was unavailable to comment for The Bucknellian.

"I welcome the fight…If other people want to roll over and admit they did something, if they did something, good for them. We deny any and all wrongdoing. We did not engage in profit sharing or any other conduct in violation of NASD rules. Our practice with our customers was that our customers set commissions unilaterally," Langone said last week to The Wall Street Journal.

According to The New York Times, Invemed, which was founded in 1974, has had a close relationship with the Credit Suisse Group that dates back to the 1980s. The companies jointly managed an offering of shares for another company Langone helped to fund, according to The New York Times. In the arrangement, Invemed would introduce companies that would issue stock to Credit Suisse, and then Credit Suisse would give a percentage of shares in a larger firm the group was managing to Invemed. According to The New York Times, in March 2000, Invemed participated in 50 new stock issues, more than 90 percent of which were underwritten by Credit Suisse.

According to The Wall Street Journal, NASD alleged that Invemed failed to "observe just and equal principles of trade, failed to close excessive clients commissions and profit-sharing arrangements, failed to keep accurate books and records, failed to supervise employees and failed to keep adequate supervisory procedures."

Forbes Magazine has estimated Langone's wealth at approximately $750 million.

Langone has donated millions of dollars to the University, and both the Student Center and part of the gym have been named in honor of his contributions.

Langone also served as Commencement speaker for the graduating Class of 2002.

"If true, [Langone's] circumstances are unfortunate. I hope that the words he offered at Commencement are those that he not only preached, but by which he lived," Kevin Swenson '93, who attended the Commencement ceremonies last year, said.

In his Commencement address, Langone advised graduates on the principles he has followed since his graduation from the University.

"Since my graduation I've observed two principles that stand above all others: personal values and one's capacity and obligation to give back to society. I confess to you that I wish over the years I had always been as sensitive to these issues as I now urge on you," Langone said.

Alumni Association brings new programs to University

By Jen Jenchura
Senior Writer

The University Alumni Association has been involved in a host of activities, including recent programs formed in conjunction with the Career Development Center (CDC), that demonstrate its loyalty to the University.

The Alumni Association has worked to redefine itself and better support programs that benefit students as well as alumni and their families. One of the Association's goals is to pique student interest about the association so that undergraduate students begin to think about how University alumni can benefit them.

"The mission of the Alumni Association is to actively and effectively advocate for alumni in order to promote and enhance Bucknell. We want to cultivate new programs, come up with ideas and, if we can, fund them," Alumni Association President Scott Singer '87 said.

The association recently made several changes. Through the creation of new programs with the CDC—such as the Bucknell Alumni Career Services program, which is available to alumni—the association has taken an active role in securing employment opportunities for Bucknellians. Tying their success with increased funding, the Alumni Association's Finance Committee has developed ways to fund new initiatives with agreements from affinity programs, such as special credit card offers.

"As a result of the monies earned, the board is able to be in the envious position of being responsible for allocation of funds to various University and alumni related projects. The two most important of these are the CDC service for alumni and the Bucknell Public Interest Program offering fellowship internships and job opportunities to students and graduates in not-for-profit agencies," Van Cleave '59 said.

The Alumni Association has funded parts of many programs. In January the Alumni Association Board of Directors officially announced the creation of the Alumni Service Career Program, a career development position that the association is underwriting for the first three years to help it grow. Shannon Bradford, the new program director, hopes to create a career development program for geared towards alumni. Bradford is responsible for this unique program.

"In keeping with the Bucknell philosophy and the CDC mission, the Alumni Career Services Program focuses on helping alumni take a proactive approach to developing their careers," Bradford said. "It is not intended to be a job listing service or to find someone a job, but instead, to assist alumni in learning how to think about career paths, identify immediate and lifelong career goals, evaluate possible careers, make career transitions, develop job search strategies and materials, succeed in the interview process, network effectively and so on."

"Almost one-third of those I have worked with are 2002 alumni who were either not yet employed, lost their jobs or were looking to change jobs."

—Shannon Bradford, Alumni Association program director*

Since Bradford's arrival last fall, she has had much response, especially from recent alumni who wish to change career paths.

"I have worked with over 160 alumni, from 2002 back through 1960, primarily via telephone or e-mail, or sometimes in person," Bradford said. "Some of the 160 I have only had one interaction with, but many of them I have conversed with several times. Almost one-third of those I have worked with are 2002 alum-

Delta Upsilon's annual Demie Play canceled

Courtesy of The Bucknellian Archives

Shown here in 1996, the Demie Play has been a University tradition for 88 years. This will be the first year in the history of the play, formerly a literary play, that it will not be performed.

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

Delta Upsilon (DU) Fraternity announced the cancellation of its 88th annual Demie Play on Wednesday. The play, which was supposed to be performed today and Sunday, is DU's main philanthropy event and was one of the longest standing traditions at the University.

After reviewing the script for the play that was presented to the administration by DU, Assistant Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Lewis Marrara said the script was too offensive and needed revisions. The brothers of DU met and decided they did not want to revise their script, and it was not in their best interest to perform a play that did not match the revised script they would present to the administration.

"The script we gave to Marrara was definitely PG-rated. I think we were forced into canceling it," DU Community Service Chair Steve Santulli '05 said.

According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, Assistant Dean of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Shuna Irwin and Marrara, the Dean of Students Office and the Office of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs did not mandate that DU cancel its Demie Play. The e-mail they received on Wednesday morning was the first that they had heard of this cancellation.

Businesses and organizations donated money for advertisements in the Demie Play playbill. According to Santulli, Business Manager for DU Scott McElhone '03 has returned all the donations.

All proceeds from the event were supposed to go to the YMCA Sports Youth Program, with which DU has been involved this year. Donations submitted by parents of DU brothers will be given to this program.

"Normally DU donates approximately $1,500-2,500 as a result of our annual Demie Play. As one of the business directors, I had already received $1,500 in donations from parents and local businesses to advertise in the Demie Bill. Essentially that is the play bill. Parents have messages for their children and the brotherhood. Businesses from town like to advertise in it since so many people come to the play and read the bill. Unfortunately, I had to send business donations back to the respective establishments," McElhone said.

According to McElhone, the cancellation of the play resulted in a $750 loss of donations to the charity.

"This was our main philanthropy event, and now we are scrambling to decide what we are going to do as far as how we will accomplish what we have to in terms of community service hours," Santulli said.

McElhone said the entire brotherhood felt forced into canceling the play.

"The main reason students come to see the play is for the hilarious satire that we put on about the campus. The past three years we had tremendous success putting on our own versions of 'Star Wars,' 'Ghostbusters' and 'Goonies,'" McElhone said. "As a brotherhood we felt we could not supply the kind of entertainment that comes with the purchase of a Demie Play ticket because of the extreme censorship required by Dean Marrara on our script."

Those students who purchased a ticket for the play on Monday or Tuesday and would like a refund may write their names and box numbers on the back of their tickets and send them through campus mail to DU, Box C3962.

"This was the 88th Annual Demie Play and thanks to the University administration, we had to end that 88-year tradition. We are tired fighting with the deans. It seems no matter what we do we are persecuted," McElhone said.

According to Marrara, he met with DU students on Wednesday and encouraged them to reschedule the play for the fall.

"The Demie Play has become a big event on campus and it is a shame that it won't happen this year," DU alumni board member Brian Watson '01 said.

Editor-in-chief reflects on term

By Jason Rubinstein
Editor-in-Chief

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Editor-in-Chief Jason Rubinstein '04 discusses a recent issue of The Bucknellian during a weekly Editorial Board meeting. He has worked at The Bucknellian since his first semester at the University.

"You're an engineer. You have a job lined up after college. You're not going to be doing anything like this after graduation and you don't need to build up your résumé."

"So why the hell are you the editor of the school newspaper?!?"

No doubt, I have heard those comments time and time again. Yet it didn't seem to matter and I never second-guessed my level of commitment to The Bucknellian. I major in mechanical engineering—almost the complete opposite end of the spectrum from journalism; however, I must say that I have learned more during this last semester as editor-in-chief of the paper than I believe I will ever get out of my engineering education. And no, that's not a result of my tendency to skip classes.

Yes, it's true. I would skip classes, sacrifice my social life and academics and go without sleep to do whatever was possible to make the newspaper better. And while there are no regrets, I realize that I must step down as editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian and focus on my "real" education and prepare for my job in the Navy.

As I have told the staff several times, I care more about The Bucknellian than anything else on this campus—and I will continue to do so. Next semester I look forward to working with those editors who take as much pride in the organization as I do.

This semester has seen a great number of improvements in the paper.

Due to the healthy working relationship that we have with our publisher, The Daily Item, and specifically Tim Switzer, we learned how to increase our photo quality to a level that rivals most other college newspapers. Our staff has put out two incredible "special" issues—"Sexual Assault at Bucknell" and "The Great Divide" on the war with Iraq—in addition to this captivating 36-page paper. I am most pleased to say that our readership has grown significantly, both on campus and off.

I have always considered the editor-in-chief position to be more of a "chief executive" rather than an "editor" of the newspaper. In this way I hope to have set a precedent for future editors-in-chief from the business standpoint. I have found that the "business people"—advertising, sales, etc.—have been neglected. I have put a significant amount of time this semester into increasing revenues to a new height (the paper is, for the most part, self-sufficient) and establishing a permanency to the business division to meet the quality and professionalism of the rest of the staff, and will continue to do this next semester.

I would like to thank Sandi-Jo Galati '04, associate editor, Michelle Dombeck '05, managing editor, and James Lee, adviser, for their tremendous support for the past 13 issues. Sandi brought her invaluable experience as news editor and successfully impressed upon the staff some of the most important issues in publishing, all while studying for the MCATs, which she will be taking tomorrow. Michelle's dedication was apparent to everyone on the staff—I swear she never left the office. She did an excellent job in any task she was assigned, no matter how important or tedious. Jim was the source of knowledge and wisdom and he was always available to talk to whenever necessary. I appreciate his openness and tremendous efforts to help improve The Bucknellian.

Most importantly I would like to thank Rachel Laskow '03, for without her continuing support, motivation, friendship and encouragement, I would undoubtedly not be writing this today. It was a privilege to be Rachel's associate editor while she was at the helm, and I am honored to have had her as a dedicated senior editor for my term.

From photographer to section editor, associate editor to chief executive, I am proud to have been a part of such an amazing team. And when most students come to campus after graduation and check out their fraternity or visit their professors, I will look forward to coming to this office and remembering how much The Bucknellian has meant to me.

I want to wish the best of luck to next year's editors, and to the more than 100 students who work toward putting out this award-winning publication each semester.

ni who were either not yet employed, lost their jobs or were looking to change jobs."

This structured program has a host of services available for a diversity of alumni, which has only seen the beginning of possibilities.

"Within the program, alumni are grouped according to age, taking into account the different issues affecting each generation of Bucknell graduates. Based upon the information learned from a benchmarking survey and alumni feedback, we are concentrating first on alumni who have graduated in the past five years. The introductory Web site [linked to the CDC site] outlines the program, services available and previews the upcoming services," Bradford said.

Like the roots of the Bucknell Public Interest Program (BPIP), the Alumni Service Career Program taps similar resources. The Alumni Association originally proposed the BPIP to the University and started the pilot program in 2000. The Alumni Association looks to build meaningful programs through its own funding at first, and if they are successful the University can make them permanent fixtures.

"The BPIP was initiated out of the efforts of the Alumni Association. Alumni got support for the program. If we can prove success then the University is inclined to allocate monies toward that program. The BPIP program director's position [held by Kathy Kennedy '01] used to be funded by the Alumni Association, but in July 2003 the University will begin paying for it," Singer said.

Three years later, the program has been successful in providing yearlong fellowships in nonprofit organizations committed to social change.

"Each fellow is matched with an alum who helps them as they transition from Bucknell to their fellowship. This program is great because it allows alums to volunteer their time helping recent graduates and it helps students learn about and work in the nonprofit world," CDC Director Laura Denbow said.

Using alumni to communicate to current students about job opportunities directly benefits alumni as well as the students.

"One of the outcomes of being in the Alumni Association is that not only do I get satisfaction out of Alumni Services that we have established, but it has given me an opportunity to meet current Bucknell students. Because of that, in the last two summers, I have hired three Bucknell students, mostly due to my connection with the Career Development staff," Board Chair of Career Development Kevin Blackwell '85 said. "I never used that facility while a student at Bucknell, because there wasn't the dedication and knowledge of the staff that there is now—students at Bucknell should feel lucky to have them, and I am glad that I am aiding them in my capacity."

The Alumni Association funds its activities through affinity programs with companies that Bucknellians already use. In exchange for royalties send to the association, the companies gain business. The New Bucknell Credit Card Provider Board agreed to contract with MBNA with a guarantee of a $25,000 sign on bonus and a yearly royalty payment of $150,000. The board then allocates this money to projects supporting alumni and the University. Other sources of revenue for the board include a merchandise program, travel program including a partnership with GEICO insurance.

"Alumni who buy insurance from GEICO will get lower rates by mentioning they are with Bucknell. We use these royalties to generate programs that help students," Singer said.

The Alumni Association is also open to partnerships with other organizations.

"We recently worked with the Arts Alumni Association and the Black Alumni Association. The Alumni Association just funded one-third of last weekends' Black Arts Festival. We also help out extensively in admission to target candidates and interview them," Singer said.

The association has been steadily improving on its goals of cultivating new programs for a wide range of Bucknellians.

"Along with Trustees, [members of the Alumni Board] are the most connected Bucknellians who volunteer extensively because we have a great affinity for our school. Current students will become alumni, so that's why we try to help current students, too. We try to have different events for everyone," Singer said.

Several faculty members suffer from morale crisis

Senior administrators claim dedicated commitment to students, faculty and preparing the University for the future meetings and less energized to serve on University committees," Sweeney said.

Sweeney said that the low morale is also evidenced in much of the administration.

"Another visible sign of low morale has been and continues to be the turnover in the administration in addition to faculty who either have left Bucknell or are exploring other opportunities," Sweeney said.

According to Sweeney, the senior administration has not given appropriate information about the state of University affairs in the faculty meetings.

"Based upon an earlier faculty meeting, I was under the impression that the results of the administrative 'Climate Survey' conducted last year would be made available to the faculty," Sweeney said. "At a subsequent faculty meeting, however, we were informed that the results of that survey would not be available. This only makes one pause and wonder about things."

Stamos framed the problem as a lack of institutional vision among the senior administration and the lack of articulation of that vision in the Vision 2010 strategic plan.

"The administration has given us platitudes, but the vision is essentially bankrupt. What they've articulated in Vision 2010, for example, has done nothing but reaffirm the obvious. What's visionary about this?" Stamos said. "The administration dresses things up to make it look like something's happening, but in the end it's a charade."

Marsh also said that Vision 2010, the University's strategic plan, lacks foresight.

"The main problem with the Vision 2010 strategic plan is that it isn't strategic and it isn't a plan," Marsh said.

Rogers said he disagrees with these criticisms of Vision 2010.

"Every effort has been made to provide multiple and varied opportunities for everyone to participate in the process of building a shared vision for Bucknell for 2010 and beyond," Rogers said. "There have been numerous forums, a retreat with more than 100 faculty members in attendance, calls for input, drafts made available for critique, criticism and revision and, often, those most vocal complained but did not always participate in a constructive manner. Vision 2010 is now being debated in a highly collegial fashion in formal faculty meetings."

Marsh said he is concerned that the senior administrators do not understand the unique character of "liberal arts" at the University.

"The administration comes in and has a vision from somewhere else, and showing no evidence of having thought well about what 'liberal arts' means," Marsh said. "And one of the things that makes me very sad is that we are a great University and that we don't have an effective spokesman, which is a huge impediment."

> "In my travels nationally and internationally, every signal is that our reputation is growing both in stature and geographically. Being student-oriented, I use student selectivity as one of my principal barometers."
> —Steffen Rogers, University president*

Stamos said he also believes that the senior administration's vision of the University does not represent the values of the majority of the faculty.

"President Rogers, in three years here, has not been able to provide leadership or vision for the University, and without leadership you certainly cannot articulate a vision," Stamos said. "I am unaware of any constituency who would support Stef, or any way he has impressed or won the confidence of any of us."

Miller said he disagreed that the responsibility for the morale crisis falls on the shoulders of the University's senior administration, but he does believe that the promise of leadership remains focused there.

"It is easy to scapegoat people, especially the heads of organizations, but that's much too simple of an explanation—this is a complex organization, and we all jointly bear the responsibility," Miller said.

Rogers, despite the criticisms, said that he is confident about the goals and direction of his presidency at the University.

"It is very easy to attack 'leadership' and 'vision' and very difficult to defend one's position against such attacks because they are so amorphous," Rogers said. "This is a tact taken often when one does not agree with the leadership's position and direction. I set a course in my inaugural address in the fall of 2000 and have not deviated from that course. I came to Bucknell to be a student-oriented president. I continue to take that stance and make no apologies for it."

Provost and Vice President for Academic Affairs Steven Bowen said that the most outspoken critics of the administration are a small group, and are by no means representative of the majority of the faculty.

"What you don't hear in the current debate are the concerns of the other 250 faculty," Bowen said. They are dedicated to their teaching, their scholarship and their students. We've been focusing on the need to address short-term issues and maintaining stability in a transitional period. This has distracted us from the active articulation and advocation of ideals that I believe we should have given more attention."

Bowen said that dissenting groups often form at any university.

"We delight in having a broad range of views at Bucknell," Bowen said. "The rhetoric of 'crisis' is heard with some frequency, but we are likely to have a crisis only if people take rhetoric out of context and overreact. You don't have to look very far beyond the Bucknell bubble to recognize that we are in an enviable position in higher education today."

> "The main problem with the Vision 2010 strategic plan is that it isn't strategic and it isn't a plan."
> —Ben Marsh, professor of geography and environmental studies*

Professor of Political Science and Latin American Studies John Peeler said that the senior administrators have not established themselves with the faculty, but it is important to understand the difficulties of the time and to not overreact.

"Stef came to Bucknell at a very difficult time, and has done his level best ... his senior administrative appointments have sometimes been unfortunate," Peeler said. "As a leader he has not established himself with the faculty, but neither has he so far committed errors so egregious as to provoke a rebellion."

Rogers and Bowen indicated that many faculty members and administrators perceive no leadership crisis at the University. The individuals they mentioned declined The Bucknellian's requests for interviews.

Rogers said that the senior administrators' approach to faculty requests has been balanced.

"The faculty members at Bucknell are highly valued by this administration," Rogers said. "Their values are our values and we share them proudly. However, this administration has committed to a number of student-oriented projects where we may not agree.... I feel our approach has been quite balanced."

Stamos also criticized Rogers for appointing Bowen to his position as provost and vice president for academic affairs.

"Bowen, given the nature of his position and the school, is a mismatch for that position, and the faculty have little confidence he can serve in it. Meanwhile, because Stef steadfastly supports him, he is losing credibility," Stamos said, pointing out that Bowen lacks the necessary experience for the position.

Rogers said that the position of the provost is a difficult one and that the criticisms of Bowen are unfounded, considering the situation of the University in recent years.

"The provost at any university is torn in many directions and it is not an easy position to learn," Rogers said. "My experience has been that it takes up to three years for one to grow into the position under normal circumstances, and the situation at Bucknell has been anything but normal. I am one who believes in giving people a chance to succeed. I think Steve Bowen deserves that chance along with all of the other new administrators. I know for a fact that Steve has talked to these faculty members, has heard them and has taken the criticisms very seriously and is making every effort to work through the various issues that have been raised."

Rogers said that the turbulent economic times have disrupted some of the administration's plans since he became president.

"In my inaugural address, I spoke of marketing Bucknell in ways that the University had not been marketed previously. Budget restrictions have prevented taking the aggressive approach I had in mind at that time," Rogers said. "However, we are putting in place steps that should not only regain our previous position, but surpass it."

Rogers also said that his research suggests that the University's status is improving despite its financial woes and other problems.

"In my travels nationally and internationally, every signal is that our reputation is growing both in stature and geographically. Being student-oriented, I use student selectivity as one of my principal barometers," Rogers said. "And, even though we have not marketed Bucknell to prospective students as well as some of our competitors have marketed themselves, and the stock market has had its impact, the past three years have been the most selective in the University's history. I think that is a clear indication of how we are viewed externally."

Several faculty members have still expressed concern that a morale crisis exists at the University, and as the enrollment in the professional fields of study increase, that the University is heading away from the traditional liberal arts college and toward a more corporatist and more professional model of operation.

"As our trustees, disproportionately from the business world, have taken a greater role in managing the day-to-day operations at Bucknell, the business mentality has increasingly supplanted the older concept of higher education as a very different entity," Assistant Professor of Economics Geoffrey Schneider said.

Miller said he also believes that the Trustee leadership bears some responsibility for stimulating productive conversations.

"There are no faculty voices among the trustees who understand leadership in the academic world," Miller said.

Professor of Mathematics Carmen Acuna said that the curriculum of the University and the Common Learning Agenda does not reflect the "commodification" trend.

"The curriculum of the College of Arts and Sciences, which is a carefully worked out faculty initiative that addresses the needs of students, is not a 'commodification' of the curriculum," Acuna said. "The latest review in 2000 concluded that the Common Learning Agenda 'has met to a high degree the aims set for it as adopted by the College faculty.'"

Schneider said that the "liberal arts" curriculum has been displaced as the University's foremost agenda, which instead focuses on an industry- or job-specific method of teaching.

"Students have become 'clients' or 'customers' who need to be catered to and trained for a specific career instead of being prepared as the next generation of citizens and leaders who need to develop their intellect and critical thinking," Schneider said.

Schneider also said he believes that the trustee leadership lacks emphasis on academic issues.

"The hubris of some of our trustees, who seem to assume that success in the business world qualifies them to understand how a university should be run and what should be taught, is one of the major barriers Bucknell faces in its attempt to preserve the liberal arts nature of the education here," Schneider said. Unfortunately, our current administration seems to have accepted this model, given that the initiatives coming from the administration. Vision 2010, merit pay and outcomes assessment, among others, all contain elements of the corporate model and mentality that are not part of Bucknell's history and are in many ways antithetical to a liberal arts education."

Miller said he is concerned by this trend and that he sees the University moving away from its former, energetic character.

"I can not speak for the rest of the faculty, but I am very sad, and the reason is because the people who hired me 25 years ago had an exciting vision and approach to the integration between liberal and professional education, which is what makes Bucknell special," Miller said.

Associate Professor of Classics Janet Jones said that the University leadership should curb this trend before it becomes ingrained in University doctrine.

"This is part of a larger trend and we have to question how we got here," Jones said. "Is there any way to get out of the trajectory that we're in, which is a bland and blind leadership in a very precarious time?"

Despite these contrasting visions of the University and the morale at the University, Rogers and the critics agree that the doors of communication must remain open and that the University community must define and embrace a common vision that is in best interest of the institution.

> "This is part of a larger trend and we have to question how we got here. Is there any way to get out of the trajectory that we're in, which is a bland and blind leadership in a very precarious time?"
> —Janet Jones, associate professor of classics*

"We need to work as a family to address the concerns of all members of the family," Rogers said. "But that can be done only if we all adopt the attitude that we will work together for the best result for Bucknell."

Fire suspends Lewisburg Domino's service

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

A fire broke out at Domino's Pizza in Lewisburg around 11:30 a.m. on Saturday morning. The blaze occurred in the main corner of the store, catching fire when a faulty heat-wave bag ignited adjacent bags. The police and fire departments were notified immediately and arrived on the scene. No one was injured, but the shelf holding the bags and the ceiling above it were damaged. Employees were sent home shortly after the incident, and Domino's was shut down.

"We don't know exactly when it will reopen. The cleanup crew is there right now," Assistant Manager Angela Straub said.

Currently, all calls to the Lewisburg branch are being forwarded to the Milton location.

Administration and faculty must work together

Do you remember how a university in the middle of Central Pennsylvania first piqued your interest? The slogan on the pamphlet said "A+B, College=University. The University is the best of both worlds—all the specialization of a University with the breadth of curriculum and personal attention of a small liberal arts school.

These pamphlets did not lie, as so many pamphlets do. One of the greatest strengths of the University is its ability to simultaneously graduate engineers, talented businesspeople, renowned philosophers and best-selling authors. It is comforting to know that corporate executives who graduated from the University have read Homer's "The Iliad" and "The Odyssey." We all know that the University has truly inspired some—our graduates are working for something epic.

So why are some faculty members questioning the current path of the University, claiming that academics are being commodified and the leadership of its senior administrators is lacking?

The educational world is rapidly changing in its focus—the need to "market" education to attract talented and vibrantly diverse students has created a profound pressure that weighs on universities nationwide. It is important for Bucknell to maintain the playing field with our competitive universities, but at the same time maintain its uniqueness.

On the other hand, a constituent of the faculty has publicly expressed its fear that the University is compromising the education of its students in its attempt to "market" itself.

As students, we lack institutional memory. Our knowledge of university life is limited by the few years we have spent here at the University. But, we do know, that without us, there would be no University.

As students we understand the meaning of liberal arts at the University. We understand interdisciplinary study, double majors, ethics and the importance of cultivating well-rounded individuality. Education should not be treated as a commodity for students—it is above and beyond what can and should be "marketed." The very nature of the educational experience is that it gives direction and inspires contemplative thought and reflection among students.

We also understand that we would not be here if no one "sold" the University to us. The quality of student that professors wish to educate would not be attainable if the University failed to market itself.

The administration openly claims that it is student-oriented, while the faculty insists that it is here to educate the student body. Students need an administration that is focused on marketing perspective students, communicating to them what the University has to offer and, most importantly, maintaining this leadership throughout the students' experiences at the University. The moment students attend their first class, it is the responsibility of the faculty to instill the hope, energy and inspiration that was promised.

Clearly there is a morale crisis that needs to be addressed. The opinions of all constituents of the University must be considered and an agreement must be reached to provide students with the education experience they were promised and deserve.

Faculty's negative, liberal bias

To the Editor:

I recently read the comments, printed in the April 4 edition, from the University community regarding the war in Iraq. I also perused first-year student Tim Hinkle's hilariously off-base opinion piece regarding the same. I found it superficially entertaining yet substantively disturbing that virtually every comment from a member of the University's educational establishment reflected a negative, clearly liberal bias, and the majority of the comments printed from the student population contained a negative tone as well.

I advise friends, colleagues and their offspring away from applying to the University, and I laugh heartily and toss all letters of financial solicitation into the trash can.

This tilt, while surely representative of our "esteemed" professorial staff, represents neither the sentiment of the country as a whole nor the sentiment of 48 percent or more of the University's student population.

Once again I find myself extremely offended at the pontificating and intellectually void rambling of the majority of the "educators" at the University when it comes to all things political.

The result of this extreme bias and lack of representation of opposing viewpoints leads to two specific results: I advise friends, colleagues and their offspring away from applying to the University, and I laugh heartily and toss all letters of financial solicitation into the trash can—a sentiment shared by every University graduate I know who managed to survive the brainwashing attempts and liberal drivel with their capacity for free and independent thought intact.

Sincerely,

Sara (Winter) Riley '89

Our glittering Class of 2003

To the Editor:

Finding students here who study harder than they have to is like panning for gold—some are held up in front of the jealous eyes of others, glittering for all to see. Looking at this river flowing from the Pierian spring, with its fabulous facilities and bubbly babble, it is hard to remember that not all that glitters is gold—especially when one has paid such a price!

But if there is one lesson most have learned at the University, it is that you needn't be genuine. The world of commerce awaits, a world of incredible pleasures to be had by anyone who can fool another into believing that this dazzling thing in your hand is not fool's gold—how else could it glitter so?

To gleam brightly so as to catch the eye of another—that is the lesson of the world of commerce, that is the lesson those in charge of this river actually believe (if they believed in the value of a real education, they would put their money where their mouths are). It is the lesson of the "real world" of business, of the world after your education, wherein you learn how the world really is and what its real values show: that the value of learning has worth only insofar as it teaches you to fool yourself into believing that you are worthless without the company. And the company, this conglomerate of pyrite, this corporation of fool's gold gleams so brightly!

Far brighter than if you were alone—and certainly far brighter than those of genuine gold, those who do not exist to dazzle but hold their inner essence and worth hidden within themselves. After all, there should be no secrets, and nothing should be hidden, everything must be obvious and glitter immediately before the eyes. Those passed-over ones, those others forgotten in the river, they console themselves: "We are passed over but we have a worth in and of ourselves ... for we strive to know and will not consider anything to be knowledge if it is not of a genuine nature—for it is in the genuine and in the truth that you find true value, not only in the nature of other things but also within ourselves...." We know better—we have learned better—we glittering ones!

Sincerely,

CHOICE housing option abused by upperclassmen

By Michelle Dombeck
Managing Editor

CHOICE (Choosing Healthy Options In Community Environments) housing—we all know, love and respect it, right? Wrong. For first-year students, CHOICE housing is great. For most upperclassmen, it's a joke.

Admittedly, CHOICE housing helps new students to meet others with similar interests and provides them with a place to live that is suited to their lifestyle. Although CHOICE is substance-free housing, we know that it's really advertised as alcohol-free housing. And as a university that was once rated No. 1 in the United States for hard liquor, it would be hard for the University to deny that it does has a strong alcohol scene.

With CHOICE, the University can claim that it provides a way for some students to find their own, alcohol-free paths. These first-year students can go to CHOICE dances, hikes, dinners and various other wonderful substance-free events.

But consider the upperclassmen who sign up for CHOICE. Although some upperclassmen may actually enjoy and appreciate the substance-free housing and activities CHOICE provides, I know that many CHOICE students are not attracted to the program because of its alcohol-free housing. Currently, Kress Hall houses four full floors of upperclassmen who seem to have chosen the alcohol-free lifestyle. Because so many students are clamoring to get into this kind of housing, CHOICE is even overflowing onto a floor of Trax Hall next year. It doesn't take a genius to realize that Kress and Trax are prime dorms. Not only are they in a great location, they have air conditioning and fairly nice-sized rooms.

Why do CHOICE students get such good housing? Is Housing and Residential Life trying to reward these students for signing up for substance-free housing? Or is it trying to entice and attract more students to this special-interest housing with the promise of prime housing?

If students are truly devoted to the CHOICE lifestyle, it shouldn't matter where they live. I'd speculate that if upper-class CHOICE housing were moved to a less attractive location, the number of students who sign up for would fall significantly.

Even besides the advantage of great dorms, CHOICE students are not actually prevented from drinking. Just as long as they don't get caught on their halls with liquor or in an intoxicated state, they're free to slink quietly back into their rooms and sleep off their stupor. The message seems to be "drink and be merry ... just not on the hall."

Hang on a second—back the sounds-too-good-to-be-true train up here. Students get prime housing (which is presumably either a reward or enticement) and can still drink? Technically, underage students aren't supposed to drink anywhere, which makes CHOICE housing essentially the same as regular housing for most students.

Perhaps CHOICE housing is just a great public relations scheme for the University. Admissions can tell prospective students (and their parents) about all of the other students who utilize this valuable resource and choose to live in substance-free housing, without alcohol. And in order to keep the number of students who are CHOICE high, Housing continually offers good rooming options and refuses to turn applicants away. Even those who have points are accepted, because people can change, right?

The University and Housing and Residential Life need to reevaluate the choice some students are making. For most, choosing CHOICE isn't a matter of wanting to live without alcohol, but a way to avoid the stress of room selection and make sure they have a good place to life.

Does CHOICE actually stand for students who choose "healthy options"? For me, it's just a SHAM—Student Housing's A Mess.

Could the U.S. also fight terror by ending hunger?

By Meghan Ball

The war is over, we have conquered evil Iraq. Now we are the liberators, standing proud and tall as we begin to force freedom upon the Iraqi people, who of course have no idea what freedom really is. We are here to give it to them, to show them the way as we guide them down the path of capitalism. And yet, we are not safe, terrorism still seems to lurk around us, like a fog waiting to descend upon our nation.

Suddenly Syria is a threat, and we are warning the rest of the Middle East to watch its step. Is this what American liberation is, our version of democracy, our economic system and no other? If we really wanted to give the Iraqi people freedom, we would give them the freedom to reject our systems and culture, instead of opening fire on their protests. But these nations are unstable, they have evil dictators, we must destroy them and then rebuild them in our image or else they will continue to feed the terrorists. Or is it really them at all, who are at the root of the terrorism? Or are Americans to afraid to ask themselves that question?

One-fourth of the world lives on less then $1 a day. The majority of humanity does not wake up and wonder weather or not they filled their Brita, but how they are going to get drinkable water. They do not wrestle with a decision what they feel like eating, but what they possibly can eat. We do not fear the advanced nations, the prosperous nations, it is the countries filled with poor that are the threat. There is clearly a correlation here, and it would take so little for us to make huge changes in these countries.

Imagine how much money you spend each day, just on food and now imagine you had only $1 and right next door is a family with significantly more food then it is capable of eating. For some reason, this family is afraid of you. It has enough bombs and guns to blow up the tiny shack you live in at least 20 times over and yet every time you even go near their house, they buy more guns. Why doesn't the family offer to help build you a well so that you are not staring thirstily at their hoses instead of buying more technology meant to keep you away?

America claims that the nations in the Middle East do not know how to use weapons responsibly, and yet we have dropped bombs on more countries then any other nation since World War II. We have been telling developing countries that we have no money to spend on helping them get potable water to their people, and yet we had $100 billion to spend on a war. During the 1990s America had an unprecedented economic boom, and yet at the same time 40 percent of people living in developing countries were in absolute poverty, the worst it has ever been. We may not all be of the same nationality or race, but we are all of the same species. The money may be concentrated in a few hands, but at the very least we should be able to provide all members of our species with potable water. It seems almost absurd when you think of how there are people who consider themselves lucky to have a well within two hours of their homes.

At first I simply assumed that Americans were too superficial to discover the roots of terrorism. We live in a nation that will pay almost anything for it to look clean and sterile, rather then carry our trash to the next garbage can. Why would we bother trying to find out why these people hate us so much when we could simply destroy them and ignore the bigger problems?

But now I think Americans are afraid to look that deep. To look at the roots of terrorism is to look at the abject poverty, in which the majority of people live. No wonder they all hate us. Americans live in a fantasy where we think we have given so much to the global community, and yet in comparison to the rest of the advanced world our contributions are minimal. The only solution we offer is war, and that is what we spend our money on. Maybe instead of adding to our defense spending we should spend that money on helping some of these nations. America spends more on the military and defense then any other nation in the world, and yet we feel as though we need to spend more. Everyone hates us; they are all out to get us—quick, we need more guns to protect ourselves. For every penny we spend on the War on Terrorism, let's spend the same amount on a War on Poverty, a War on Hunger. Even if we only spent half as much, or one-fourth, the impact we would make would be enormous. Why not go to the root of the problem, and reverse the hatred.

Earth Day is no reason to celebrate

By Phil Martoma
Senior Writer

This Earth Day has given me time to reflect on some of the finer points of our country, but I particularly notice my immediate surroundings, here at the University. It was clear to me that our nation might be heading in the wrong direction with regard to the environment after U.S. President George W. Bush rejected the Kyoto Treaty. Much time has passed and now the American people have long since forgotten that issue. In place of any coverage about the status of our environment in the media has been the overwhelming babble about the war in Iraq. This Earth Day also carried with it little of the fanfare about serious environmental issues our society is facing and, especially on the campus, seems to have been met with apathy.

I write this article not to point out one of the variety of environmental issues still plaguing us, but instead to point out why we should still be concerned. In this era where smart bombs can make us feel that war has no costs, and fear that terrorists will inevitably crash our planes into our own cities, we forget that there is an environment to care for. When we all learned the fundamental truth—no matter how free trade can get on the Internet, our stock market will still crash and many people will get left behind—few consider the costs their actions will have on the future of our planet.

I write this article not to point out one of the variety of environmental issues still plaguing us, but instead to point out why we should still be concerned.

You do occasionally see the few in the library who take those extra steps to the recycling bin just so as to avoid throwing good paper into the trash, but the environment usually brings little to no concern to people these days. Nor does the fact that even that little sentiment of responsibility towards the environment is nullified as the recycling bins are always emptied into the garbage bins rather than being recycled.

This one issue has and probably will for many decades constantly be overlooked by our people until when we turn our heads to look away from our economic recessions and building in flames we will see one more sad sight that is equally detrimental to the economy and a threat to our nation. That sight will be a world where one mistake while drilling from the Alaskan wildlife preserve left an oil spill that would make the Exxon Valdez look like a tiny snafu. That may also be a picture of the Brazilian landscape that is devoid of life and simply not arable.

This does not have to be the case, but there is nothing to suggest that serious environmental policy will come from either Republicans or Democrats. There are a variety of reasons for this, but among them is that the current focus on the power struggle between Democrats and Republicans has left an easily preventable problem unchecked. It seems to me that the only action I can constantly do is to try and help create this change, and that I would encourage in others is to try and motivate others and ourselves with the image of what the world could be like.

Though I consider myself an environmentalist, I do not particularly enjoy recounting all of the awful ways we are destroying countless species as well as sewing the seeds of our own destruction. Instead, I think it wiser to try and point out that if students demanded a better environmental policy from our University, then we just might see a time when our University no longer significantly contributes in avoidable ways to the solid wastes filling our dumps.

We might even go further to try and buy less rather than more, leading simpler lives that don't require the addition of the next best product from a Management 101 Company. It will only heighten our resolve towards the environment to first incorporate environmental principles into our lives, and ask no less from society itself.

Can science prove the existence of God?

By Kyle Lange
Staff Writer

It seems that creation versus evolution debates always end up with the equivalent of two bighorn sheep butting heads. The evolutionists accuse the creationists of being terrible scientists and the creationists accuse the evolutionists of ignoring evidence and trying to disprove God's existence. Each side claims that they have disproved the other side and the debate continues.

As a Christian physics major, I find myself caught in the middle. There is genuine evidence for evolution and the Big Bang, and scientifically speaking, the theories are sound. On the other hand, my own personal experiences lead me to believe in the existence of a God who created me in His image, cares about me and is personally involved in my life. This has led me to ponder the question, "What would it take for science to prove the existence of God?"

In order for something to be proven as a scientific principle, it must hold under rigorous tests in a variety of different circumstances. The principle should be able to predict what will happen in any given situation. For example, Newton's law of gravitation is universally accepted because it has held under a series of tests and is able to explain so many things (why objects fall to the earth, why the earth goes around the sun, why comets travel the way that they do, etc.). The power of Newton's law of gravitation is shown in that it can predict how any object will move in response to the objects around it.

Thus, to experimentally prove or disprove God's existence, a scientist would have to devise tests that would either demonstrate God's existence or absence. In so doing, the scientist would have to predict how God would respond in certain situations. The impossibility of inventing such tests and predictions is clear. Could we as finite mortals ever accurately predict the actions of an omniscient, omnipotent, omnipresent deity?

A quick look at the nature of God as presented in the Bible confirms the folly of this approach. God promises blessing to Abraham's descendants and then proceeds to allow them to be enslaved by the Egyptians for the good part of 400 years. That's not exactly what I would call blessing, even if they did finally make it to the Promised Land.

The Psalms are rife with complaints from David about God being unjust, the wicked prospering, etc. It's not surprising that David felt that way, considering that after being anointed as king of Israel, he spent fifteen years as a fugitive running from the madman who was still on the throne. True, he did eventually become king, but his path to royalty is not one that I would want to take.

Job probably had it the worst. Satan came to God and told Him that the only reason Job trusted God was because Job had the good life. God in turn released Satan to take away all of Job's worldly possessions, kill all of his children, and afflict him with boils. Job questioned God persistently until God showed up and essentially said, "I am God, you are not. How could you ever expect to understand why I do the things that I do?"

In the end, Job's health, family, and possessions are restored, but you are left wondering if all of the suffering was necessary for a man described as "righteous" by God.

And in the New Testament, does Jesus go to great lengths to prove his deity to the world? When the religious leaders asked Him to perform a miracle to prove His deity, He wouldn't do it. Jesus had a perfect opportunity to do this after rising from the dead. He could have just gone out and started teaching in the temple like He had been doing before. Instead, He chose to reveal himself only to a select few before He ascended into heaven.

It seems like the God of the Bible would not hold up under the scrutiny of the scientific method. In terms of human justice and reason, He usually does what doesn't make sense. In short, the scientific method can only prove the existence of a god that acts predictably, which is a contradiction in itself.

Getting back to my original point, the key difference between creationists and scientists is that they assume very different things before they make their arguments. Creationists are open to the idea of an unpredictable god, while scientists assume that truth can only be determined through a series of testable, repeatable and predictable experiments. It's not surprising that they never seem to find common ground.

Mass media destroys human experience

By Tim Hinkle
Staff Writer

I see a trend enveloping our human society, one not easily identifiable. No, it's not that J.Crew released its fall catalog early, but something much more insidious. This trend isn't even that of international terrorism. Instead, we are forgetting what it means to simply be human beings. Forces external and internal are forcing an evolution of our minds and bodies of which most of us do not understand the short- and long-term consequences. My advice is to listen to musical magician Keller Williams and simply "stay human."

We are forgetting what it means to be truly human. To have a connection to the earth and to each other. Our lives are becoming increasingly virtual, which makes it easier and easier for forces in the media and government to insidiously manipulate our opinions and motivations. Think about it: How much time do you spend at the computer or television versus outside? With the separation of most people from their sources of food and other consumables, we have lost any sense of the environmental implications of our excessive lifestyles. The world population is growing at an amazing rate and is expected to reach 9 billion by 2050. If we think we can continue our current course of reckless consumption, we are flat out wrong. Earth, our only home, is in danger, and we may be one of the last generations able to save it from ourselves. We need to recognize the interconnectedness of all life—that the earth is a closed system whose resources will not last forever. The solution to this is to reclaim our sense of nature, of wildness. We need to learn to live with, and not against, the land.

The media, which in a democratic society, usually acts as a watch guard for an excessive government, has become increasingly "embedded" and indistinguishable. Wouldn't it be awful to live in a country where entire television channels are devoted to government propaganda and misinformation, like Iraq suffered under its president, Saddam Hussein? It would, which is why it surprises me that Fox News is the most popular cable news station in America right now. Trends like this lead to widely-held yet false viewpoints, for instance how over half of Americans think that Hussein was somehow behind 9/11, which is simply untrue. Their confidence in our entrancement with the media spectacle is so complete that a recent commercial for Fox's new reality television show, "Mr. Personality," contained the words, "Don't ask. Just watch." If you're not appalled, then you aren't paying attention.

We are being programmed by the Bush administration and news stations like CNN and Fox News to be afraid. Notice the constant shifting between yellow and orange terrorism alert levels? The government keeps assuring us that terrorists are ready to strike at any moment. Not only that, but Iraqis want to kill us too! Now that no weapons at all have been found, nothing hinting at the vast weapons program which would soon be turned on the international community (that means YOU!), it would seem clear that it's all about keeping us afraid. So why have we been so safe from these cowardly terrorist attacks? If the Bush administration has actually been able to head off all these attacks, then it speaks highly of its effectiveness in doing so. But, at least to those of us who are paying attention and asking questions, it is becoming increasingly clear that these threats of attack are nothing more than a well-organized plan to keep us afraid.

If we are afraid, we won't question how invading a country that has nothing to do with our current problems with terrorism will make us safer. If we are afraid, we won't question our overconsumption and think about the long-term sustainability of the planet, or our role in its destruction. If we are afraid, we won't question our Congress relinquishing its democratic rights to keep the president in check. In short, if we are afraid, we won't question anything, and if we know anything about the Bush administration, it is that it hates answering questions. So I say, start questioning the authorities, and stop being afraid! Reclaim your real life, turn off your television! Most of all: Stay human.

Lessons learned in my four years

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

I've undoubtedly accumulated a fair amount of knowledge since I've been enrolled as an undergrad here, so it seemed appropriate to share the most interesting and important tidbits for my final Bucknellian column. Without further ado, I present the things I have learned:

- Safe Rides is not a non-gender discriminating service.
- With the dawn of each new fall semester comes at least three new rules and regulations as well as the hiring of one new dean.
- The Concert Committee is actually a club for people to meet and hang out who all possess a similar bond: a terrible taste in music.
- Four successful Stop the Hate rallies have ironically failed to stop the hate.
- Dean of Students Richard Ferraro's exceptional understanding of alcohol and its related issues has enabled him to understand that underage drinking and driving is equally heinous a crime as of-age beer pong.
- It is not a contradiction of terms to consider a person's commitment to free speech as "unswerving" while simultaneously maintaining that any language that's considered "insensitive" to minorities is prohibited.
- This semester, whenever I miss a class for a "personal reason," I feel the need to apologize to my father for the $420 or so I just wasted. Sorry, Dad.
- It is far easier to have your application accepted for enrollment as an undergrad than it is for any number of campus employers to accept your application for employment.
- The mandated 30 hours of "community service" I have to perform at the end of the semester (which subsequently means missing most of Senior Week) is, from all experiences heard, far more aptly defined under the University's hazing policy than the drinking events that got me the punishment. Also, I will be charged $600 if I show up to these three days of manual labor in shorts—only $300 if I don't go at all. (There was no mention of whether or not I would receive a $900 fine if I both stayed at home and wore shorts those days.)
- The faculty's interests seem to consistently clash with not only the students, but also the administration and the Board of Trustees.
- Perhaps the most renowned degree outside of our engineering department, business management, has been "capped" because it is too popular.
- The Temperance House makes the best bang-for-your-buck Long Island Ice Teas around. The Highlands Pub has the best beer selection. And you have to pay to listen to music at "the bar."
- In the realm of our University, 500 of our female students (about one-eighth of our student body) have or will be raped.
- Seventy-four percent of the graduating class will leave campus with a sexually transmitted disease (seriously, they announce this during Orientation).
- If you are turning 18 and thinking about breaking the law by not registering for Selective Services, Professor of Geography Ben Wisner has materials outside his office that will assist you. Also, he has interesting figures on his door about the hundreds of thousands of innocent Iraqis that are going to die in the current war in Iraq.
- The total thus far of letters to the editor writing in favor of articles I've written: .5. The number of letters stating positions against something I've written: 18. Also, the person who was kind enough to put the flyer on my door notifying me that it was "Tom Elliott Appreciation Day" was not being truthful.
- A small area of grass was recently discovered between Phi Psi and Lamda Chi Alpha fraternities. The Building Commission was immediately notified and, in the near future, will be replacing the grass with a building.

While this list may seem to be fairly negative, it does not accurately reflect the time I've had here. While unending stupidity will always emanate from the administration, the student body seems willing and able to keep their heads straight, stay focused and, above all else, have fun.

For those graduating this May as well as the ones returning in the fall, I wish you all equally good luck and an interesting future.

The other side of our foreign policy

Some underreported facts seem contradictory to rhetoric

By Suzanne Van Hulle
Writer

Over the past month, I have been deceived in many ways by the U.S. government. I would like to emphasize that this article is in relation to the U.S. government and not to the U.S. "people" per se. I would also like to express that the reason for writing this article is so that we can all be aware of certain facts and actions that are not usually discussed.

I believe that something had to be done with the situation in Iraq, but I disagree with the actions that have been taken. In my opinion, the U.S. government has been hypocritical in several ways:

1. On the first day the bombings began, U.S. President George W. Bush declared that there was a direct relationship between the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon and Iraq. Linking Iraq with terrorism makes many U.S. citizens feel better about the validity of going to war with Iraq. This is a false statement, which I find unacceptable for the U.S. president, or any other president for that matter. It has not been proven that there has been any link between Iraq and terrorism. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein hardly trusts his people, so it is highly unlikely that he would trust terrorist groups with his weapons of mass destruction (WMD). Even though is it possible that such weapons exist in Iraq, without proof Bush should not have made such a statement.

2. Operation Iraqi Freedom ... freedom? Internationally, those states opposing the war on Iraq have envisioned the U.S.- and Great Britain-led attack on Iraq as an invasion. Is chaos a sign of liberation? Will Iraqis respect the new government set in place by the U.S. government? Will the United Nations help out with the reconstruction? If the United States does not receive international help, the situation might even be worse than what it was under Hussein. Hopefully, the U.S. government will not abandon the Iraqis as soon as interests fade, as it did in Afghanistan. Many Iraqis are happy to see Hussein's regime take an end, but does that really mean that they are happy to have U.S. troops taking over their territory?

3. Bush claims that one of the reasons the U.S. government needed to attack Iraq was that Hussein has violated at least 17 U.N. resolutions. Does the U.S. government really respect the United Nations and abide by its laws? It is true that the United States is one of the most powerful forces within the United Nations, and has contributed enormously to its cause. But at the beginning of the war, the U.S. government disregarded the job of U.N. inspectors by invading Iraq without awaiting the completion of their job. In my opinion, not only is this disrespectful, but also hypocritical. If the U.S. government does not respect the United Nations, then it should not accuse Iraq of not abiding by U.N. resolutions.

4. Respect for sovereignty has always been one of the primary goals for the U.S. government. There is no doubt that Hussein is a brutal man, but isn't he the leader of a sovereign state? By invading Iraq or, as others might see it, by waging war on Iraq, the U.S. government is violating one of its most important values. By the same token, the U.S. government is also seen by many as an invader and an imperialist state. What if another leader decided to overthrow Bush?

5. I sometimes wonder if all those people who are for the war realize what is really at stake, especially in a country whose WMD capabilities are unknown. Many of those U.S. soldiers who fought in the first Gulf War are still suffering from diseases created by disarming Iraq 12 years ago.

I also feel that the humanitarian aspect of the war is overlooked. Even though Bush has been careful to emphasize the importance of humanitarian aid, this aspect has been ignored by the mainstream U.S. media, particularly during the major bombings, as very few pictures of Iraqi civilians have been shown. If the U.S. media describes the Iraqi military as villains, then they should also show the other side of the fighting and the damages the U.S. military has caused to civilians, not only to the Iraqi army.

Isn't it ironic that the U.S. government wants to give Iraqis aid when sanctions have been depriving them for over a decade?

In conclusion, I want to stress that this article is designed to express a counterpoint. I feel that the general public should pay more attention to facts that are not normally mentioned, whether they are reported by the U.S. government or by various media sources. Hopefully, this article will not misinterpreted, but will show that there are always two sides to a story and this is also true with states' foreign policies.

Floor traders of the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) are responsible daily for billions of dollars. The NYSE announced it's beginning an investigation to examine the role of specialists in the trading process and ensure that specialists were putting customer interests first and not working for personal gain.

NYSE launches investigation to examine improprieties within trading system

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

The New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) is one of the most closely watched stock exchanges in the world, with billions of dollars changing hands each day on the Wall Street trading floor. The fairness of the NYSE's trading system came into question late last week when the NYSE announced that its own regulators were looking into improprieties at some of the firms that provide specialists to the exchange.

The hallmark of the NYSE's system is the specialist, whose job it is to match buyers and sellers in a trade. Although many say a computer could do a better job at matching the two, the NYSE disagrees.

According to The Wall Street Journal, "Backers of the specialist system say specialists can do what a computer can't—establish a price (sometimes by using their own capital to buy or sell shares) that ensures as many buyers and sellers are satisfied as possible."

A major problem with the system is the reason for the investigation—a practice called "front-running." The Wall Street Journal described this practice as giving certain customers inferior stock trade execution, forcing customers to lose a little money for the specialist's gains.

In The New York Times, NYSE chairman Dick Grasso said the exchange was looking into "trading patterns," but declined to say whether any specialists were suspected of front-running customer orders.

"Anyone who approaches putting the customer second is going to be off this floor and out of this industry," Grasso said on CNBC.

According to The Wall Street Journal, specialist firms included in the inquiry are Fleet Specialist; LaBranche and Company; Spear, Leads and Kellogg; Bear Wagner Specialists and Van Der Moolen Specialists.

"Earlier last week, FleetBoston Financial Corp.'s Fleet Specialist unit suspended its trader who oversees the buying and selling of General Electric shares," The Wall Street Journal reported. "The suspension stemmed from an internal inquiry prompted by the NYSE's broader investigation. A Fleet spokesman said the suspension, which occurred Monday, was 'an internal matter.'"

This latest problem further exposes the NYSE and calls into question its desires. It also highlights the problems the NYSE is having with its directors.

Announcing the presence of an investigation, the NYSE said, "Protecting investors is of paramount importance to the New York Stock Exchange. Throughout our history, the NYSE has watched the marketplace and monitored its member firms and individuals to ensure that all investors, small and large, can be assured a fair and level playing field."

The stock market is supposed to be impartial and actions like those alleged take away from the fairness of the market.

There has been much talk about changes that need to be made by the NYSE. Its practices and directors, generally heads of firms whose stocks the NYSE lists or who do business with it, are coming under fire.

The New York Times reported that Sanford Weill, chairman and CEO of Citigroup, withdrew his name last month from consideration to be a director after New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer objected. Todd Christie, the former CEO of Goldman Sachs' specialist group, also removed his nomination after resigning.

Invemed Associates, a New York investment banking firm, was accused by the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD) of "illegally sharing profits gained from newly issued securities with customers," according to The New York Times. According to the NASD, the firm did this by inflating trading commissions. The company has announced that it will fight the charges.

All of this comes on the tail end of a scandalous few years on Wall Street, with many companies listed by the NYSE going bankrupt or seeing key people arrested in fraud cases. The NYSE will be forced to change its practices and the NASD will only become more aggressive in pursuing its own goals of protecting investors' money. Front-running will be investigated and companies will have to change the way their specialists are watched during the trading day.

BUSINESS & POLITICS

Front and center: politics in review

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

❖ Commentary

Politics may seem these days like a ubiquitous subject, injecting itself into every crevice of daily awareness thanks to round-the-clock coverage on the Internet and on CNN, MSNBC and Fox News Channel—especially when the news out of Iraq is not compelling or when the war ends too soon to make for any real good storylines. We see politics in the statements and actions of athletes and entertainers, we see it in the statements of our elected officials and we see it in campaigns.

The Patriot League is not known for sending athletes on to compete at higher levels of their sport. Most do not take the path Adonal Foyle took to the NBA. As the only Patriot League player to move to the NBA, Foyle has a unique perspective on the world.

Foyle, a graduate of Colgate University, was interviewed by ESPN recently. The reporter said of him, "His game may not be all-NBA material, but in other ways Adonal Foyle is the best in the league. Folks don't notice him; they don't ever think about him. But they should. Wanna know why? Because he's one of the most outspoken, intelligent and interesting athletes in the game. In any game."

Why am I talking about Foyle? In this time of war where we have athletes and celebrities criticizing Washington, Foyle is a breath of fresh air. He may not support the war 100 percent, but he has a reasoned point. And Iraq isn't even his real focus of attention. Instead, Democracy Matters is his passion. Foyle founded the group in 2001 to work on college campuses to push for campaign finance reform and other social reforms.

Athletes like Foyle should use their publicity and status as role models to further a cause that is close to their hearts. Like Foyle, they should use a passionate belief about an issue to raise awareness. He believes passionately about campaign finance reform and is working to advocate this cause at the grassroots level.

Since we are talking about sports, I think I should mention Pat Tillman. The former Arizona Cardinals strong safety left his contract to join the Army Rangers and is now in Iraq serving his nation.

> Primary days become circuses and elections like the one in 2000 make people wonder why we do politics the way we do.

With soldiers like Tillman still in Iraq, U.S. President George W. Bush is moving much of his public focus away from the conflict. The war is largely over and it is now time to focus on a huge domestic issue that is extremely important to Bush, the economy. Some worry that he is heading down the same path his father used after the Persian Gulf War. Former U.S. President Bill Clinton defeated former President George Bush largely because of economic concerns.

Early this week, President Bush announced that he would back Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan for another term at the helm of the nation's financial system. Greenspan has served in this capacity for 16 years and many feel that Bush's announcement may be a smart move. The Wall Street Journal reported that the move was a "a shrewd political move that could help quiet complaints about the White House's handling of the economy."

Greenspan has not been completely kind to the Bush administration and some of his criticisms have been on the money. He has repeatedly downplayed the role a large tax cut would have on resurrecting the faltering economy.

Politics is hitting close to home this week with Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., coming out and criticizing the possible outcomes of an upcoming ruling by the Supreme Court. In an interview with the Associated Press, Santorum said, "If the Supreme Court says that you have the right to consensual (gay) sex within your home, then you have the right to bigamy, you have the right to polygamy, you have the right to incest, you have the right to adultery. You have the right to anything."

Whatever your stance on this issue, you have to hold Santorum accountable for his words. Although he denies he had any malicious intent in his words and maintains the AP misrepresented his comments, Santorum is now ripe for shots from the Democrats. They will most likely show Santorum the same type of love they showed former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, who made comments about segregation at Strom Thurmond's birthday party. What happens to Santorum is likely to affect his further political desires.

Finally, we have the issues surrounding campaign politics. The posturing begins too early and the public is inundated by mixed messages and ambiguous negative advertising that misses the real message. Primary days become circuses and elections like the one in 2000 make people wonder why we do politics the way we do.

There are several things going on right now in political circles that deserve commentary, not the least of which is the announcement on the front page of The New York Times.

Bush is planning to start his re-election campaign this year, on Sept. 2, at the Republican National Convention. The convention, scheduled to take place at Madison Square Garden in New York City, will be the latest date for the party's convention.

According to The New York Times, the date was chosen "so the event would flow into the commemorations of the third anniversary of the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks. The back-to-back events would complete the framework for a general election campaign that is being built around national security and Mr. Bush's role in combating terrorism."

I think the president may be taking a very big risk in tying his re-election to Sept. 11. The event, which so horrified the nation, did serve to unite the public behind Bush. A national tragedy may not be the best event to play against when launching a political campaign. Nobody doubts Bush's leadership following the event and this theme may help him in his bid for a second term in office, but the American public may see this as a dirty political move and may react negatively to Bush.

Politics is front and center in today's 24-hour news environment, primarily because it deeply affects everything we do. The American public owes itself some level of awareness that can bring a more reasoned approach to the democracy we have. The stories and political maneuvering we see are distilled by the media and it is our job to make sense of it all.

Protesters in South Korea burn a North Korean flag and a mock nuclear weapon. Multilateral talks conducted in Beijing, China, will be aimed at alleviating tensions that have been mounting along Asia's Pacific Coast since last October when North Korea took steps to reactivate its nuclear program.

Fighting fires in the Pacific

In a crisis that has run concurrent to the war in Iraq, the United States, North Korea and China held three days of talks starting April 23 in Beijing concerning North Korea's nuclear weapons program. Since the reactivation of its nuclear program several months ago, North Korea has caused tension throughout the international community.

These were the first talks scheduled between the United States and North Korea since last October, when the United States accused North Korea of restarting its nuclear weapons program, which it agreed to scrap in 1994. The United States already believes that North Korea possesses one or two nuclear bombs, in addition to its aspirations for more. North Korea countered that the United States was planning to invade under the same grounds it used for Iraq.

The American accusation was not without merit. North Korea initially claimed that it needed to reactivate the plant to help alleviate demand for energy in the economically struggling state. North Korea has since removed U.N. monitoring equipment from its old nuclear plant in Pyongyang, the country's capital. North Korea also expelled U.N. weapon inspectors, restarted several other facilities and threatened war unless the United States held one-on-one talks.

According to The Financial Times, North Korea admitted to reprocessing nearly 8,000 spent nuclear fuel rods, a procedure that would allow the country to produce enough plutonium for about six nuclear bombs within months. Pyongyang also withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which discourages the spread and creation of nuclear weapons.

The North Korean government released a further statement, which said that the U.S.-led war with Iraq had proved that "in order to prevent a war and defend the security of a country and the sovereignty of a nation it is necessary to have a powerful physical deterrent force."

Washington loathes seeing the communist countries gain such weapons, as does South Korea and much of the Asian peninsula.

According to CBS News, U.S. State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said that Pyongyang's weapons programs "are a matter of concern to the entire international community." He also said that the eventual inclusion of Japan and South Korea in the talks would be essential, given their proximity to North Korea. The multilateral approach that the United States is determined to take regarding this issue contrasts with how it handled the Iraq crisis.

There have been rumors circulating that the United States may attempt military action in North Korea after war in Iraq or use other means to deter North Korea from its nuclear ambitions. According to CBS News, U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld released a document proposing that the United States team with China to depose the communist leader of North Korea, Kim Jong Il. Rumsfeld has also made several suggestive remarks at news conferences that military action should be taken against North Korea.

U.S. President George W. Bush remains hopeful that a diplomatic solution can be reached. According to CNN, Bush said, "There is a good chance" that diplomatic methods will succeed in solving the crisis.

"China's policy is for a nuclear-weapons-free peninsula, and now that they are engaged in the process, it makes it more likely it's going to occur," Bush said. "Japan strongly believes that. And I believe that all four of us working together have a good chance of convincing North Korea to abandon her ambitions to develop nuclear arsenals."

Bush said that North Korea is already wilting under American and international pressure, considering that it has accepted multilateral talks as a concession on their part, given their previous demands for talks only with the United States.

The United States must solve this issue quickly and diplomatically so that it can show the world it is able to cooperate with other countries, given the international concern raised by the handling of the Iraq situation.

Bush seeks global cooperation to reconstruct Iraq

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

With the war in Iraq at a relative end and the regime of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein a memory, U.S. President George W. Bush called upon the United Nations to lift sanctions on Iraq. Since the Persian Gulf War, the U.N. Security Council repeatedly imposed economic sanctions that inadvertently targeted the Iraqi people.

> "The Iraqi people are reclaiming their own streets, their own country and their own future."
> —George W. Bush, president of the United States*

According to CNN, Hussein actually reaped profits from oil-for-food contracts and other U.N. resolutions, which sought to undermine the Iraqi leadership in the past decade.

Deputy White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan signaled that the Bush administration would soon seek a resolution allowing Iraq to "restore a normal trading relationship with the global economy."

Despite all this optimism, The New York Times reported that consent from all member states within the U.N. Security Council is necessary for a new resolution. Already proving problematic is Russia's indication that it would oppose any measure to lift sanctions from Iraq.

Before leaving for Texas to meet with returned POWs during the Easter holiday, Bush signed a $79 billion spending bill for reconstruction purposes in Iraq. According to The New York Times, approximately $20 billion of the new bill has been set aside to pay for war costs.

With victory at hand, many have questioned the whereabouts of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, which were an integral justification for the United States waging war. MSNBC reported that the only evidence of such artillery was the discovery of empty containers made in Great Britain. Members of the U.N. Security Council have expressed second thoughts about recognizing a U.S.-led victory in Iraq until the affirmed weapons of mass destruction have been located.

The feud over the whereabouts of Iraqi weapons is expected to fluster opposition to the lifting of U.N. sanctions on Iraq. The reason is simple, The New York Times reported. Lifting the sanctions would indicate that Iraq does not possess any weapons of mass destruction. Until those weapons are found and destroyed, a new resolution ending sanctions may encounter some resistance within the U.N. Security Council.

Bush assured an audience last week that "the Iraqi people are reclaiming their own streets, their own country, and their own future." CNN highlighted comments made by the president that suggested Iraqi reconstruction would not undertaken without difficulty.

"With all the hardships of this transition, the lives of the Iraqi people will be better than anything they have known for generations," Bush said to CNN.

Questioning its immediacy, BBC News revealed that the lifting of U.N. sanctions would allow Iraq to sell oil to facilitate post-war reconstruction. Many warned that such a proposal would only serve to spark another thorough round of negotiations within the U.N. Security Council. U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said that the lifting of Iraqi sanctions would depend heavily upon the discovery of its weapons of their mass destruction program.

> "The lives of the Iraqi people will be better than anything they have known for generations."
> —George W. Bush, president of the United States*

A policy of containment towards Iraq was legitimized through various U.N. resolutions since the end of the Persian Gulf War in 1991. Ending the sanctions without any evidence of banned weapons in Iraq would severely undermine the legitimacy of the United Nations, as well as the war itself.

Tax cut dispute is a "bad precedent"

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

The past weeks have seen a surprising reversal for U.S. President George W. Bush. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has been officially deposed as ruler of Iraq—a culmination of an initiative that Bush began in the summer of 2002 and a major political victory. At the same time, two Senate Republicans have taken up arms against him, voting with the Democratic minority to trim his proposed tax cut by more than half.

> "That House and Senate GOP leaders would write two tax reconciliation numbers in the budget—$550 billion for the House and $350 billion for the Senate—is not only a cry of desperation by our Republican friends, but also an outrage and a farce!"
> —Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md.*

According to The New York Times, their House counterparts, and the president, have expressed anger not only at Republican moderates, but also at the Senate leaders who failed to bring them into line.

"When the president, the vice president, the leader of the Senate, 46 of your colleagues say, 'Let's go forward and give this a try,' I think it is pretty amazing that one or two people would decide that they know exactly the right number, and it's the very lowest possible number that anybody is willing to talk about," House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said to MSNBC.

Tax cuts have been a key part of Bush's economic plans since he took office, and the $726 billion bill that came before Congress this month was merely the latest in a series of attempts to jumpstart the American economy. A House compromise cut the amount to $550 billion, and all indications were that, that version of the bill would go to the president's desk. According to the Associate Press, moderate Republicans in the Senate, claiming that even the reduced amount was too much and too soon, refused to vote for any cut totaling above $350 billion over 10 years. House Republicans had no warning of the result of the vote, which caused many to blame Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

"The House, and the White House were completely blindsided," an anonymous "top" administration official said to MSNBC. "To say that everyone was angry is an understatement."

A meeting between House and Senate Republicans failed to produce any agreement on the subject, forcing both sides to drop the tax cut from the bill entirely and pass only a budget resolution. The resolution is a broad blueprint for the coming year's budget that defines only upper limits for the budget's spending totals. It does not end the conflict, but merely postpones it until one legislative house brings it to a vote again.

"Clearly the understanding is explicit that the package remains at 350 [billion dollars]. Our voices have clearly been heard at every level," said Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, according to CNN. Snowe is one of the two Senate Republicans opposing the House's cut, along with Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio.

This is the first time that a budget has been passed with different numbers for the House and Senate, and Democrats call it a "bad precedent," according to The New York Times.

"That House and Senate GOP leaders would write two tax reconciliation numbers in the budget—$550 billion for the House and $350 billion for the Senate—is not only a cry of desperation by our Republican friends, but also an outrage and a farce!" Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said to CNN.

The budget plan does alter the terms of the dispute in one important respect. Any further debate on the size of this tax cut is exempt from any procedural rules on filibuster, a process under which any group can prolong debate indefinitely unless 60 Senators vote to end it. This means that, under no circumstances, will it take more than 50 votes to pass one version of the cut.

For his part, Bush has given up calling for the $726 billion cut, instead backing the House's version.

"We need tax relief totaling at least $550 billion to make sure our economy grows," Bush said to CNN. "The proposals I announced three months ago were designed to address specific weaknesses slowing down our economy and kept companies from hiring new workers. Those weaknesses remain today."

Since the budget resolution was produced on April 9, the only action that has been taken on the subject came in the form of a series of television advertisements financed by a private conservative group called the Club for Growth. The advertisements, which began running on April 19 in Snowe and Voinovich's home states, attack them as opposing economic growth, according to the Associated Press.

"Not only is this a defeat for the president, it is a defeat for the Republican Party," President of the Club for Growth Stephen Moore said.

No matter what happens within the GOP, the tax issue, along with all other business, will remain dormant until Congress returns from a two-week recess on April 28. It remains a high priority for the Republican Party as a whole and especially for Bush, who has already had to deal with one prolonged budget conflict in his term.

The Bucknellian names All-American Molly Creamer as the Female Athlete of the Year

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

At a cocktail lounge in California, Rocky and Rudy are smiling at Lewisburg, Pa. These two sports icons, who captured the love of moviegoers everywhere by overcoming monumental obstacles with heart and determination, are waiting to make room at their table for Molly Creamer '03. Creamer deserves a chance to rub elbows with the two sports legends after using her own outstanding heart and love of the game to earn spots on the 2003 Associated Press All-American squad and the WNBA draft prospects list.

"She has so much love for this game and it's evident every time she steps on the court," All-American campaign coordinator Kelli Sheesley said. "It made everything I was doing seem worthwhile."

Whether Creamer stays after practice to shoot extra jumpers or she hustles to beat the bells at 10 o'clock mass, passion dictates her lifestyle. This unequaled heart made her cherished by the Bucknell community, and now the nation. In fact, her hard work and passion for the game are the two traits that attracted Bucknell to Creamer.

"Molly has always been a behind the scenes individual wanting to cheer the parade on from the street corner," close friend and University Catholic Chaplain Marty Moran said. "A lot of the 'Bucknell Molly' was in place before she arrived."

These two awards are certainly the most fitting rewards for Creamer because each honor's essence is difficult to put into words. This only seems appropriate for a woman who always preferred actions over words. According to former teammate Lori Houck '99, the media room was a challenging place for the modest Creamer.

> One of Creamer's favorite quotes:
> "The vision of a true champion is somebody who is bent over, drenched in sweat at the point of exhaustion, when nobody else is watching."
> —Mia Hamm

"My senior year [Creamer's first-year season] we were often pulled together to speak with the paper and radio reporters. Molly always answered every question by crediting someone else on the team," Houck said. "Sometimes, I think she lost track of the question because she was busy crediting all her teammates."

Daily Item writer Tom Housenick discovered that comments about Creamer's passion are usually just deflections from more individual praise when he interviewed her last year after setting the old record for most points in a single game.

"She couldn't put a sentence together about her unbelievable performance, but she was excited about a play or two by her teammates and the meal she was having later that night at Perkins," Housenick said. "She would only talk of her desire to keep playing the sport she so evidently loves."

Creamer netted 2,462 points, more than any other male or female basketball player in Patriot League history, yet one of her brightest moments came in a half

Baseball dominates Patriot League

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

After a drama-packed home series against Army last weekend, the Bucknell baseball team is bearing down on what looks to be a promising postseason. The Bison split both doubleheaders with the Black Knights, improving their league record to 11-5 and their overall record to 20-11.

According to preseason polls, the Bison should have been wallowing somewhere in the basement of the Patriot League by now. Instead, the team is thriving on top of the league and has secured a playoff spot.

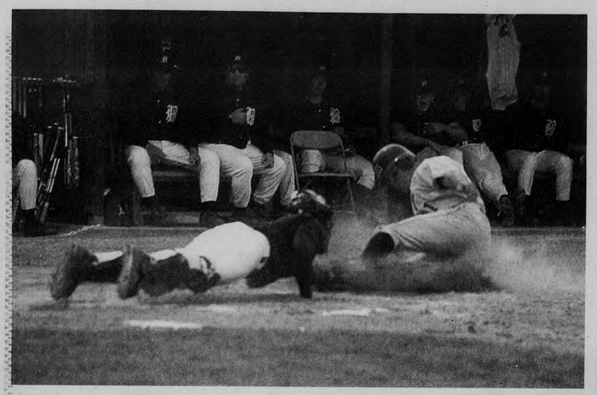
The series against Army was marked by both achievement and frustration for the Bison, as they won the first game of each day in dominating style, 2-1 and 9-0, but were unable to take the second games of each doubleheader, falling 1-5 and 6-7.

Assistant Coach Rick Ciccione said that there are two ways to look at the weekend.

"On the one hand, we should have won three of four games," Ciccione said. "On the other hand, we won two more games against them than we did last year and emerged from the weekend still in first place by a game. The latter is the approach we need to take."

"We control our own destiny and I am confident that we will go out and clinch the home-field advantage for the playoffs this weekend."
—Rick Ciccione, assistant coach

The two victories provided enough highlights to outweigh the disappointments. High-points of the weekend included a stunning one-hit complete game by Zach Allen '03, a stellar weekend for Patriot League Rookie of the Week Kyle Walter '06 and a Patriot League record-tying ninth save for Phil Futrick '06, as well as several other superb efforts from the team.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Catcher Phil Bunting '05 is airborn as he places the tag on Army's Schuyler Williamson during the second game on Sunday. Williamson was out on the play, ending Army's three-run third inning and preserving the Bison lead.

Kevin Miller '04 started things off for the Bison with an excellent outing in the first game on Saturday. He held the Black Knights to just one run on six hits in 6.2 innings of work and struck out eight batters along the way.

"We've become accustomed to great pitching performances from Kevin Miller," co-captain R.J. Grant '03 said. "He sets the tone every weekend."

Pitching dominated the game from both sides through the first four and a half innings, as neither Bucknell nor Army could plate a run until the fifth inning. The Bison got on the board first when Walter led off the inning with his second home run of the season, a solo shot to left field. The talented rookie went three-for-three in the contest.

The Bison padded their lead with another run in the sixth. Sam Moss '04 singled and then advanced to second on an error before Brian Day '05 moved him to third with a sacrifice ground out. Brian Hirschberg '04 sent home Moss with a sacrifice fly, giving the Bison a 2-0 lead.

Army broke up the shutout in the seventh inning, scoring a run with two outs in the frame, but Futrick came in to strike out the final batter and close out the win for the Bison, contributing to the effective pitching that would carry through the weekend for the Bison.

"The pitching staff once again showed why we are amongst the elite in the league," Kevin Burns '03 said.

In the second game, the Bison struggled to regain the momentum they had in game one, falling 1-5 to the Black Knights.

Army threw two runs on the board in the first and three in the second, jumping to a 5-1 lead. The Bison scored their only run in the first inning when a Hirschberg double scored Ben Stoll '04. Hirschberg accounted for three of the Bison's five hits in the game.

Neither team scored in the final four innings of the game. Matt Daley '04 pitched 4.2 strong innings to hold Army scoreless, striking out three and giving up only two hits.

The first game of the second day provided one of the finest all around performances by the Bison squad so far this season, as the Orange and Blue dismantled Army 9-0.

"Game three was our best game of the year in the Patriot League," Head Coach Gene Depew said. "We got an outstanding pitching performance from Zach Allen for the third week in a row. We played errorless defense and scored nine runs."

Ciccione had similar sentiments about the game.

"That was probably the most complete game we have played all year," Ciccione said.

Allen's performance was among the memorable of the season, as he faced only 23 batters—two more than the minimum—in the complete game shutout victory. He finished the day giving up just two walks and a hit, ending with a no-hitter to his credit. He is only the fourth pitcher in Bucknell history to pitch a one-hitter.

Bison come together for an inspirational huddle before the seventh inning.

On the other side of the ball, the Bison batters came through with an offensive explosion, troubling the Army pitchers for nine runs on nine hits.

The Bison started off with a bang in the first when Stoll led off with a double. A walk and a steal by Hirschberg put runners on second and third for Ben Krentzman '03, who sent them both home with an RBI single.

They added two more in the third when Moss singled, Day walked and Hirschberg slammed a double to center field to score Moss. Krentzman was hit by a pitch to put runners on the corners for Walter, who hit into a fielder's choice that allowed Day to score and give the Bison a comfortable 4-0 lead.

Women's lacrosse clinch spot in P.L. playoffs

By Cecily Cairns

The Bucknell women's lacrosse team clinched a spot in the Patriot League Tournament with its 12-8 win over Villanova last Saturday. The Bison are now 7-6 overall and 3-3 in the league, good enough to place them third in the standings and secure a spot in the playoffs.

The scoring was dominated by Suzanne Raffaele '03 and Meredith Wright '04. Raffaele netted four goals in her final home game and Wright added three scores and an assist.

The first half of the contest was mostly give-and-take between the Bison and the Wildcats, although Villanova did manage to string together three goals in a three-minute span of time starting with 21 minutes, 27 seconds left in the half.

Raffaele scored the Bison's first three goals of the game, netting shots at 29:15, 23:25 and 14:05. The Orange and Blue scored four goals in the last 15 minutes of the half, leaving the first frame with a 6-6 tie.

Amy Hasler '04 scored the first goal of the second half for the Bison with 28:32 remaining. Four minutes later, Villanova evened out the score yet again to bring the game to 7-7.

A goal by Victoria Field '06 gave the Bison an 8-7 lead with 18:11 to go. The shot, Field's second goal of the game, kicked off a spree of four unanswered goals for the Bison. Raffaele, Amy Lee '05 and Wright scored at 16:30, 14:34 and 11:09, respectively, to give Bucknell a 11-7 advantage.

Villanova could only manage one more goal on Nichole Kallis '03, who ended the day with 12 saves. Both Kallis and Raffaele had excellent outings in the last home games of their collegiate careers.

The Bison opened the lead back to four when Wright scored a goal with 2:10 remaining in the game, allowing the Bison to cruise home to a 12-8 win and a tournament berth.

The team will square off with Colgate, the league's No. 2 seed, in the first round of the tournament on Saturday in Washington, D.C. They will play one more regular season game before the playoffs begin, traveling to Drexel on Tuesday.

Bucknell men's and women's track and field teams both finished second to Mid-America Conference power Kent State, with the men squeaking out a tie for second with Rhode Island, this past Saturday at Bucknell's five-way meet.

Coming into the last event, the 4x400-meter relay, with Bucknell's men leading Rhode Island by only two points, the Bison had to beat the rams for second overall or finish no worse than one place behind the team in the 4x400 to ensure a tie for second. As the Bison have been hard pressed to find four quality legs in the 4x400 all season, the outlook was grim. With the support of the entire team, Ryan Newberger '05 made believers of many, as he led the team to a second-place finish in the relay, a season's best time, and a tie for second overall.

Noel Powell '03, shown here running in the Penn Relays, added the 100-meter and long jump to his list of wins along with his win in the 200.

Earlier, Newberger had stepped up to win the 400-meter (48.66) and place second in the 200-meter (21.57) behind teammate Noel Powell '04.

"It all just kind of came together," Newberger said. "The competition was great and really pushed me along. I knew I had to give it my all if I was going to perform well. This was the first weekend I've actually felt strong in [the 400], especially on the last straightaway."

Powell's reign of fire for the season continued as he added the 100-meter and long jump to his list of wins along with his win in the 200. The men also got wins and seasonal bests from Ryan Delaney '06 in the 3,000k steeplechase and Adam Kaufman '03 in the hammer throw.

Dan Lounsbury '05, Aaron Hanlon '04 and Rich Alexander '03 gave the Bison second-place efforts in the 5,000-meter, 800-meter and 110-meter hurdles, respectively. Lou Palma '03 placed third in a very competitive 1,500-meter, one of only two events of the day that the saw the winner hit the NCAA regional mark.

"I was very happy with the way the team competed," Newberger said. "It's always a little disappointing to come in second, but we were up against some really strong competition."

Newberger said he was most impressed with Dan Franke's first javelin competition.

"Hearing about Frake's last-minute entrance into the javelin was probably the highlight of the meet in my eyes," Newberger said. "He knew we needed points and decided to enter into yet another event to gain us some."

On the women's side, the competition was primarily between Bucknell and Kent State with Robert Morris finishing a distant third. Charity Brady '03 led the team with a 400-meter win, third-place finish in the 200 and was a part of the winning 4x400.

"Kent State has an excellent track program," Brady said. "I think it was good for us to compete against them, because they brought in a lot of strong competition. All in all, I think we held our own against them."

"The women's team looked great this weekend. Everyone got out there and competed, and that's what Coach wants us to do. All of us are right on track for competing at leagues."
—Charity Brady '03

Brady definitely held her own, as in all three events she ran seasonal bests. Even so, Brady was most pleased with the combined efforts of her teammates.

"We qualified for ECACs in the 4x400-meter, so I was very happy with all my teammates," Brady said. "We all ran hard."

Maria Garcia '04 helped the effort by throwing a huge school record to win the hammer (180-11). Garcia, already an NCAA regional qualifier, improved her best by over eight feet.

Theresa Dennis '03 jogged for an easy win in the 5,000-meter, helped

Bison try for first-place finish in P.L. for fourth straight year

The graduating seniors have won more games than any class in University history

The Bison men's lacrosse team beat Colgate 10-9 in its second-to-last league contest of the season. With the win the Bison need only one more win this weekend against Lehigh to ensure a share of the Patriot League Championship, which would make it the fourth straight year that they have at least tied for the title. The win also means that this year's senior class is the all-time winningest class in the University's rich lacrosse history.

Unfortunately, the Bison's victory against Colgate is also bittersweet, as they will unlikely make the NCAA Tournament since Army ensured the outright win of the Patriot League with a win over Hobart, which gives them the sole automatic bid. The Bison would lose the head-to-head tiebreaker against Army since they lost to the Black Knights last weekend 10-9.

The Herd jumped out to a commanding lead early against Colgate, taking a 7-2 lead into halftime. Leading 3-2 midway into the second quarter, Kyle Morin '06 and Michael Petrash '05 scored just 17 seconds apart to make the lead 5-2. Patrick Christensen '03 then rattled off two more to make it 7-2 going into the break. Morin finished with two goals in the game, both in the first half.

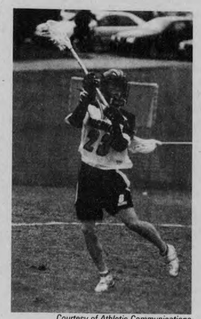
"I was getting some nice looks early in the game," Morin said. "The defense wasn't breaking down that well, and I took advantage of it."

The Bison knew coming into the game that they would need an Army loss in order for their win over Colgate to mean anything. At halftime they saw the scores of the games around the nation and learned that they were unlikely to get that loss. The disappointing news could have been one of the reasons for a sluggish second half.

The Raiders jumped all over the Bison, scoring the next five goals of the game to tie the score at seven.

"Give Colgate some credit—they've definitely improved," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "It wasn't so much that we weren't at the top of our game, it was just a function of some of the swings that occur in every game."

Despite the Colgate run, the seniors got their team motivated and focused on winning the game for pride. Goalie Justin Sussman '03 anchored the defense at the end of the game and finished with 13 saves, six of which were critical ones in the fourth quarter. The preseason All-America selection is now third all-time among University goalies in saves.



Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Kelly Hogue '03 converted a pass by Andrew Copelan '03 for the go ahead goal against Colgate on Sunday.

"We were able to build up a five-goal lead, but they got back into it because we let down a little bit in the second half," Sussman said. "We still found a way to pull through."

In a span of just 1:33, the Bison tallied three goals to make the score 10-7. Kelly Hogue '03 scored off an Andrew Copelan '03 feed, and then Rob Lane '03 scored two unassisted goals. The defense was able to hold on for the win.

"The important thing is what the score was at the end of the game," Jamieson said. "When they got it close we stretched it again, which is the sign of a good team."

Coming into this season, the Bison felt like they had what it took to win the Patriot League outright and gain the automatic NCAA bid. Even after they lost some key players early in the season, they still felt like they should beat any team. The loss to Army last weekend was disappointing because of these expectations and because the Bison were ahead and dominated the entire contest.

"We let one get away and it cost us," Jamieson said. "We had it in the bag and we let it slip away to a team that is playing very well right now, but one that we should've beaten."

Despite not making the tournament, the seniors still have a lot to be proud of. The win over Colgate gives them the most wins of any class in University history, an incredible accomplishment when considering the illustrious program history.

Maybe even more impressive is the four straight years the Bison have won or shared the Patriot League title, a feat unheard of in recent memory.

"It's a great honor. We came in here all together, and we knew right away that we were going to make a difference. We haven't let down the expectations coming in at all. Every single senior has made a tremendous impact on this program," Sussman said.

The Bison defense is a big reason for the success of the team this season and the three preceding it. After the first four weeks of play, the University captured all four Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week awards and was ranked third in the nation in goals allowed per game, allowing fewer than five goals in all of their wins. Sussman is big reason for the defensive and team success. Midway through the season the goalie ranked No. 1 in the nation in save percentage with .703. Sussman graduates as one of the best goalies all-time in University history.

Starting midfielder Andrew Sauders '03 has been part of the senior class that has won more games than any other class in Bucknell history, an incredible accomplishment when considering the illustrious program history.

"The important thing is what the score was at the end of the game. When they got it close we stretched it again, which is the sign of a good team."
—Sid Jamieson, head coach

"I'm honored to be mentioned in the same breath as some of the great goalies in University history. I never dreamed of having this kind of success. It's a tribute to our defenses that make this program very conducive to goalies," Sussman said.

The recent success of the program is further enhanced by the difficulty of schedule that they have played recently. The Bison have competed against some of the top teams in the nation including North Carolina, Maryland and Penn State, not to mention the difficulty of playing in the Patriot League where Hobart and Army have been historical perennial powerhouses.

"All of our four losses this year have come against potential tournament teams," Jamieson said. "That gives a good picture of the level of competition that this program is playing against right now."

Starting midfielder for the Bison Andrew Copelan '03 has played a vital role for the team throughout the past four years. "He is almost like a quarterback on the field, the kind of player who makes very few mistakes. He is an intangible guy," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said of Copelan.

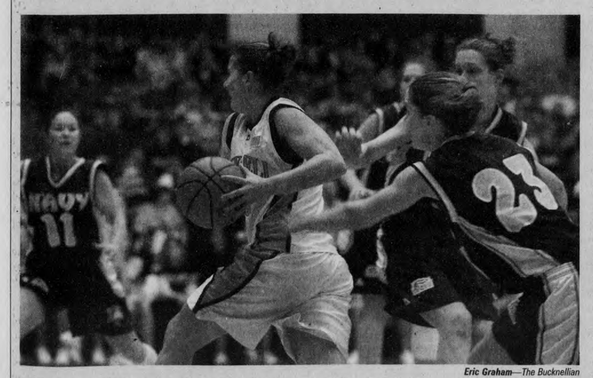
where she established herself as a consummate team player. The Bison needed a dominating performance by Creamer to upset Holy Cross in the Patriot League Championship game last year, but she deferred countless open shots and effortlessly carved up the Crusaders' defense with eight crisp assists, giving the Bison a halftime lead. They never relinquished that lead as the team cruised to the program's first Patriot League Championship.

"She was the leader and just played out an incredible tournament by distributing when she needed to, getting people involved where they could be successful, scoring herself when we needed it and rebounding," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "The look of intensity on Molly's face as she retreated back on defense, pulling her hands together and focused on charging the team up, will forever be etched in my memory."



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Molly Creamer '03 drives to the basket in an earlier game against Navy. After the season was completed Creamer was awarded Patriot League Player of the Year for the third consecutive year.

Creamer's refusal to be denied is also attributed to her passion for the game. Her heart faced an ultimate test earlier this season when Lehigh visited for the grand opening of Sojka Pavilion. Creamer and the Bison struggled mightily as Lehigh built a commanding lead with just over five minutes remaining and seemed poised to coast to an easy victory. Creamer's heart beat faster than ever those last five minutes as she scored 17 points, including a stretch of 14 straight, to almost single-handedly steal the victory for the Orange and Blue. While she amassed that amazing point total, Creamer's pure will and desire contributed to each basket far more than her skill and talent.

"In my eyes, an All-American is someone who not only is one of the best players in the country, but also works harder than anyone," co-captain Kate Franks '03 said. "Over the past four years, I have been honored to play with Molly and watch her work at a level higher than anyone else."

Creamer's level of play and commitment are well-respected by rival members of the league as well. Teams created specialized defenses to minimize her impact on the game, but Colgate Head Coach Beth Combs admitted that their task was rarely achieved.

"She has continued to improve in each of the past four years at Bucknell. She can score off the dribble, off the catch and in transition. She can take over any moment of a game," Combs said.

As Creamer looks to continue her heroics in the WNBA, the community that watched her grow into an icon will be rooting her on. There is no better way to wish her luck in the future than by sharing the words of those who love her in the present.

"I am going to miss everything she brings on and off the court," Kristin Valdner '04 said. "Molly has taught me so much about the game and about the love for the game."

Creamer's coach looks forward to seeing the progression of Creamer's career.

"A smile will always come to my face when I hear the name Molly Creamer," Fedorjaka said.

In her college career, Creamer has also gained the respect and encouragement of other coaches.

"There are two words I want her to remember as a departing student-athlete from Bucknell: Game On," Houck said.

Move over Rocky and Rudy—set another place for Bucknell's hero of heart, Molly Creamer.

"When I look back at my four years, I will only probably remember a couple of games. But I will never forget the times with my teammates, the hard times, the good times, the life long friends I have made. I just feel very lucky to have had the experience I have had, and to have met so many wonderful people who have impacted me so much. I will miss coming into the fieldhouse and just seeing so many familiar friendly faces."

On Thoroughbred racehorse Zippy Chippy:
He may be the best story in horse racing, and his trainer, Felix Monserrate, is making sure that he snags a few headlines on the professional baseball front as well. Why is Zippy, a scrawny-looking gelding with the grace of a dump truck, so famous? Because he knows how to lose. Very well. You won't hear any whiny excuses or cries of injustice (à la pampered media-darling War Emblem) from Zippy's camp. No, there are no excuses for Zippy Chippy. He just stinks.

On Toni Smith's protest of the American Flag:
Our flag—and all the beauty that it represents—has everything to do with sports. Everything.
That is why we line up, facing our nation's symbol, with all its political implications and all its history, good, bad and otherwise. That is why Old Glory flies over ballparks, stadiums, gymnasiums, racetracks and playing fields all over our nation. That's why we line up, with our hands over our hearts, shoulder to shoulder with our teammates, our comrades, and face the flag.
So go ahead and turn away. You have every right to do so. Turn away from all of it.
The athletes who really get sports, the people you think are naïve, from multimillion dollar, hotshot, world-class athletes like Mike Piazza and Al Leiter to broken-down walk-ons like myself, will still stand aside our teammates and face that flag.
We—the blind patriots, the political sheep, the hypocrites—we'll do just fine without you.

On the Raiders' treatment of teammate Barrett Robbins:
But the fact is, the biggest game of their life is over and they blew it. They blew it well after the clock had ticked zero, in the locker room, when faced with a decision to assume the worst about their teammate or hold back their speculation long enough to realize that something wasn't right. They chose to attack.

So I'll throw this memory, this tribute, into the vast compilation of eulogies and nostalgic laments of his passing. Maybe I'm not as wise, or as experienced, or as elegantly profound as the minions of writers who can boast a real historical appreciation of sports, but I can still say thank you.
Thank you for the autograph. Thank you for the smile. Thank you for the highlights I've seen on NFL Films, the stories I've read and the impact I know you've had on every football game I've ever watched and every quarterback I've ever loved.
Thanks, Johnny, for making this sport everything it is supposed to be.

On the Buccaneers' competing in Super Bowl XXXVII:
… This league seems to spew out Cinderella stories as though there's some secret, ancient script signed by Pete Rozelle that necessitates a certain frequency of cloying, sappy, zero-to-hero ascensions to fame per each half-decade. With that in light, the Buccaneers chances, based on the past-pathetic-ism factor, are pretty damn good.

On being almost perfect:
There will always be losers, and sometimes in the process of losing they will be subjected to great agony. But if they are lucky—and most of them are—they will be fortunate enough to step out on the mound, the field, the track or wherever they belong, and have the pleasure of trying again what they failed to achieve the first time around.

He just wanted to protect his wife, and hurling himself—all 160 pounds—between her and the monster bearing down on them was the best he could do.
Luckily for her, luckily for him—luckily for golf—Hogan's selflessness made all the difference.

On baseball's slow-starters:
Ineptitude is kind of fun, at least for those of us watching from afar. Fans love lousy teams. So do sportswriters. It's somehow comforting to be able to chuckle at the collective misfortunes of a team like the Tigers.
Laughing at—and immortalizing—baseball's blunderers is an act of rich tradition through the sport's history. If not rich, at least a little colorful. Being self-destructively slow-out-of-the-gate isn't really a distinction any of the league's 30 teams are gunning for, but some teams throughout the past century have left their mark that way.

On Ed McCaffrey's return to the NFL after fracturing his leg, which he likened to a "bee sting":
His career could last another game, or it could last another seven years. While he's banking on the latter, he's aware of the former as a possibility, and it's evident that he's prepared to play every snap as though it will be the last one he lines up for. Then again, he's been doing that his whole career.
One thing is for certain: However long it lasts, McCaffrey's return has been, and will continue to be, a pleasure to witness. No one in the league is more dependable, more hard-knocking or easier to cheer for than Easy Ed. He's indefatigable—unflinching, really—and for that reason he is in some ways indestructible.
If his metaphoric bee is lurking behind every snap, every hit, every cut of every route, brandishing its wicked stinger like a bayonet on a loaded rifle, you'd never know it by looking at him.
Maybe it's because he possesses a courage that could outgun any antihistamine on the market.

On the 2002 American League Championship Series:
When it comes to the Anahiem Angels, foul luck has nestled itself deep beneath the languid roots that constitute the team's past. For the Minnesota Twins, misfortune is infesting and suffocating the bright green buds that were once poised to bloom into the franchise's future.
One team with a past from hell; one with a future of nightmares. It's difficult to decide which team's circumstances cry out the most for salvation.

Feb. 28, 2003
On heartbreak:
It's Tony Saunders sitting down behind a battery of microphones in late August of 2000, with a sling engulfing his left arm and a huge white splint partially obscuring the tattoo on his shoulder—a tattoo with the words "my world" scrawled over an image of a hand gripping a baseball. It's watching Saunders use his right hand, his functional hand, in a desperate and unavailing attempt to hold his tears at bay. It's the look in his eyes, glassy and bright red, as he faced the glaring lights and admitted to the media, to the baseball world, to those who had followed him through his first bout with a broken arm, and worst of all, to himself, that baseball and all the dreams that go with it were no longer feasible—"his world" would never be the same.
… There's something else to heartbreak, though, that sometimes falls by the wayside, something that Page 2 doesn't attend to. It's hard to see, since it's buried in the shadow of tremendous sadness, but it's there.
It's Tony Saunders, a month after he said goodbye to baseball, clad in street clothes and still donning a sling, crouching on the back of the mound at Tropicana Field—a place that had once played a crucial role in his now-forsaken dream. It's the beautiful 3-year-old girl—Saunders' daughter—standing in front of him, proudly dressed in an oversized Devil Rays jersey with her daddy's name and number on the back, hurling the ceremonial first pitch towards the plate with all her strength.
It's the look in Saunders' eyes, maybe a little glassy, but no longer red, as he walks away from his old world—a world he'll never forget—one last time, with his new world—the world he'll live for for the rest of his life—at his side holding onto the hand of his good arm.
That's what makes it tolerable. Where death is the end of a story, heartbreak is only the end of a chapter.
Sometimes you just need to keep reading.

Get rid of the closer

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

On Saturday, I had the "privilege" to be at Shea Stadium to watch closer Armando Benitez blow his fourth save in a little over a week. The Mets took a 5-4 lead in dramatic fashion, as Roberto Alomar ripped a two-run double to the right-center gap in the bottom of the eighth inning. At the start of the ninth inning, the bullpen doors swung open, and the 36,000 fans at Shea Stadium began bracing for another nerve-wracking inning at the hands of Benitez.

From the minute Benitez stepped on the field, almost all 36,000 fans let out a cascade of boos. I, too, angrily expressed my great displeasure at seeing Benitez come out onto the field. My boos, and I believe the boos and catcalls of a lot of other fans at Shea, were not directed as much at Benitez as they were at the entire concept of the closer.

In the not too distant past, teams did not have one set pitcher, whose job it was to come into the game in the ninth inning with a one-to-three-run lead to get three outs. Instead, managers would either leave their starter in for a complete game, leave in a reliever who had been successful in that game, or would go to a new pitcher who would be best suited to face the opposing team's upcoming batters. That all started to change in 1969, when major-league baseball began keeping track of the "save" statistic. Saves are awarded to the pitcher that gets the last out of a game with the team holding a lead of three or fewer runs, or if the pitcher holds any lead for the final three innings of a game.

The closer role was further developed in the 1980s during Dennis Eckersley's tenure as an Oakland Athletic. Eckersley became the first reliever to be used almost exclusively for save situations and nothing else. Throughout the late '80s and early '90s, many other teams in baseball adopted this model and established one pitcher to be their "guy" to come in and shut the door in the ninth inning.

So, what is so horrible about having an exclusive closer to use in save situations?

First, it is ridiculous to save your best relief pitcher for a save situation. Many times, a critical situation will arise in the sixth, seventh or eighth inning, where the pitcher that is considered the "closer" should be used. The manager will rarely put the "closer" on the mound, simply because it is not the ninth inning. For example, let's hypothetically say that the Dodgers are leading the Giants 5-4 in the bottom of the seventh inning. There are two outs and the Giants have the bases loaded for Barry Bonds. This will undoubtedly be the biggest at-bat of the game, so the Dodgers should bring in their "closer," Eric Gagne, assuming he has the best chance of getting Bonds out. It would be foolish to save Gagne for a ninth inning save opportunity, because there will likely not even be a save opportunity if Bonds is not retired in the seventh.

Next, way too often, teams take out a starter or middle reliever who had been pitching very well after the eighth inning, strictly because it is going to be a save opportunity. If a pitcher has been dominating opposing batters, he should stay in to close out the game, unless he is obviously tiring. For example, let's say that Oakland is beating Seattle 3-2 after eight innings. Mark Mulder has allowed only six base runners all game and has only thrown 105 pitches. It would be ludicrous to bring in Oakland's closer, Keith Foulke, even though he has historically been very successful at closing out games. Mulder has proven that he has his best stuff on that given day, and there is no way of knowing whether or not Foulke will be on top of his game. Mulder should stay in the game, regardless of the fact that it is a save opportunity.

Another issue is the save stat, which has led to the overemphasis of the closer role. Managers and players put too much importance on trying to accumulate as many saves as possible for their designated closer.

Also, the save can be a very deceiving statistic. For example, a pitcher could lead the league in saves with 50, while having had an awful season if he blew 15 saves in the process. Saves can also be very misleading, because some saves come much easier than others. Saves do not discriminate between retiring the heart of the order with a one-run lead and getting the bottom of the order out with a three-run lead. Save percentage and quality saves are more telling statistics of the success of a closer.

Now, back to Benitez. There is no reason that Benitez should have come in to try to close the game last Saturday. He had thrown a lot of pitches in earning a save the previous night and had been struggling of late. Mets' manager Art Howe should have rested Benitez and put a hotter and more rested arm on the mound for the ninth inning.

Once Howe decided to go with Benitez, it is inexcusable that he did not have another pitcher getting ready in the bullpen, considering Benitez's recent struggles. Howe, obsessed with the notion that Benitez must close out the game and earn a save, foolishly decided that the Mets would win or lose at the hands of Benitez.

Also, just to show how deceiving a stat the save is, Armando Benitez is currently tied for third in the National League in saves, despite having an abominable start to his 2003 season.

The Decker Effect … exposed!

By now you've seen in my articles a common attempt to incorporate a truly marvelous and ubiquitous force—the Decker Effect. What started out as an inside joke quickly spread to consume the lives of those involved! Pieces describing events such as Manute Bol's professional ice hockey tenure, and New York Yankees and all $120-plus million that wasn't enough to win the World Series in 2002 are all vivid examples of the Decker Effect. Our very own sports writer, Aaron DeRosa '03, has yearned to learn more and asked that I elaborate on this topic: explaining what the Decker Effect is, where it comes from and why I write about it, almost religiously, in my weekly articles. So for Aaron and all of you, let's dig deep and investigate this phenomenon.

The Decker Effect is everywhere! Real-world examples include our very own computer scientist scare of the Y2K bug, the Detroit Red Wings and their early exit from the playoffs, and the current limp stock market.

What is the Decker Effect and where did it originate? Let's head back to October when a few sports buddies of mine decided to go on the Activities and Campus Events trip to Baltimore Inner Harbor. Once we got our basketball and NASCAR racing games out of our system at the ESPN Sports Zone, we headed out to what seemed like an outside carnival. Many people had joined in a circle to watch what we later found out to be a mime show. Curious as we were to get the full exposure of Baltimore life, we joined the scores of onlookers. While the act was amusing, we noticed a particular behavior of the mime that puzzled us. At various points in her routine she would begin to run around the crowd and wave her hands in an obvious attempt to pump up the crowd. What shocked us even more was once the crowd finally got into it, her next trick was nothing more than hopping on one foot across the makeshift stage. What?! That's it?!?! You mean I got up off the ground and actually attempted a golf clap for that? My immediate feeling was of disgust. I turned to my right and the first person I saw was my friend Rob D. I immediately exclaimed, "That was the Decker Effect, I tell you!" (You put it together, guys.) Following that outburst, my other buds began to laugh and remark on things in their life that were the Decker Effect—big buildup, with little results. Staying true to his name, Rob is the epitome of the Decker Effect—he never responded to my many attempts to quote him in this article!

Hard as it is to keep a joke going, the icing on the cake came not 30 minutes later when we stopped into a mall and watched a man attempting to play with a huge piece of fudge on a marble surface. Again he whaled his arms to get the crowd going—to do what you may ask? Just to grab half of the fudge with a spatula and slap it back down to the table.

This was just too much for us to handle. Instantly, my other two friends turned to Rob and said, "Yep, that's the Decker Effect!" Unequivocally and officially, the Decker Effect was born! Others, who had been enticed to stay also felt the "shock and awe" and big let down, proceeded to leave.

Who can be affected by this phenomenon? Everyone is capable! The Decker Effect is everywhere! Real-world examples include our very own computer scientist scare of the Y2K bug, The Detroit Red Wings and their early exit from the playoffs and the current limp stock market. Hmm, my girlfriend would even say my own weekly articles. So next time you look at a diet program's claims, or the next time you stand in line with all your expensive books to be sold back, remember the Decker Effect is looming!

This being my last Bucknellian sports article I'd like to thank The Bucknellian for the chance to express my views on sports happenings, my friends who read my articles each and every week, and, most importantly, my girlfriend, who has been supportive, sometimes nagging me to pour my heart and soul into my articles! I wish continued success for my Cowboys, Stars, Mavericks and Mets!

Sports Vision 2010

Two years ago when I first began writing this column I kicked it off talking about all that I really knew about: New York sports. With no cable to catch SportsCenter and only a rudimentary working knowledge of worldly athletics, I set out to describe the Big Apple with as sardonically insightful a wit as I could divine from my inexperience. Here at the end of the road, it seems appropriate for me to branch out beyond my bubble and offer a brief glimpse of the future of sports at Bucknell, at home and abroad.

Bucknell
With the purchase of the Susquehanna River from Mother Nature, Bucknell expandeo its women's crew team to 300 while the men's team dwindled to five. Unfortunately, the commute to the river is still hampered by the University's failure to secure the farm lot. This does not stop the all-female duck hunting team from practicing regularly.
Meanwhile, the football team's roster which has swelled to over 400 athletes, including 100 walk-ons which no longer count against the Title IX statistics thanks to President Bush, still can't crack a .500 record.
The wrestling team now exists only in small cult-like circles that gather in the tunnels under the campus every full moon. They are denied their Supreme Court appeal, the last in a series of eight. To spite the bitter squad, the University begins work on the 5,000 seat hockey rink as the hockey team is finally promoted to Varsity status. Many wrestlers weep.
In response to the faculty's concern that the University has spent too much on athletics, the University has built a 15-story tower whose first four floors and massive parking complex are all reserved for faculty and administration.

National
After spiraling into a rage after the seventh consecutive World Series loss, George Steinbrenner fires Todd Zeile as head coach of the New York Yankees. It is rumored throughout the ESPN community that Pete Rose is next in line. Sadly, the Yankees have been afflicted by the "Curse of Contreras" ever since the Cuban defector was sent down to single A ball in a move that sparked a Jerry Springer-like moment between Big George and Joe Torre which ended poorly for Mighty Joe whose head was stuck on a spring and hung outside Steinbrenner's door like some Conradian bobble-head Kurtz-moment.
Hockey has continued to expand. Every community over 15,000 people has a hockey rink and an NHL team. Not surprisingly, there are more players than fans.
David Carr, quarterback of the Houston Texans is league MVP. His leading receiver is Jerry Rice whose age is creeping up slowly but surely on his uniform number. There are well-known murderers starting at every position throughout the league. The Cincinnati Bengals haven't fielded a competitive team in over three decades.
In the NBA, LeBron James has grown fat and addle-pated. He no longer slashes to the hoop so much as sluices like Jell-O between fingers with all the speed of an Iraqi weapons inspection. The playoffs have been expanded to five rounds and basketball players, similar to baseball's "boys of summer," are now affectionately dubbed the "four seasons." This prompts every playoff game to begin with a beautiful rendition of "December 1963 (Oh What a Night)" rather than the national anthem.
In support of women's golf, the Augusta Nationals now accept women onto their links, but in exchange, homosexuals, blacks and the Jewish are no longer allowed. They claimed this was to stop the protests while simultaneously maintaining their long-standing bigotry.

International
Japan leads the world in baseball World Series titles. Despite losing all their greats to the Yankees and Mariners, the scrappy Japanese players muscle their way through with more heart than the overpaid Americans can muster. The Germans and Chinese are both contenders but only because they have instituted an actual baseball draft similar to a military draft requiring all children ages 12 and up to begin a strict pitching, batting and catching regimen.
With the success of Yao Ming, the Chinese began giving incentives to families who could raise children who were over seven feet tall and could boast an adequate jump shot. Genetic pairings a la Gattaca began occurring with great frequency.
Russian figure skating is banned and French judging is reserved for croissant sales. The Olympics are held in America, yet again in tribute to the greatest country in the world (just not in soccer—an insult that America tries to diffuse by claiming soccer isn't a real sport).

It's a mixed up crazy world seven years from now. By that time, I've been awarded a Ph.D., the Middle East is referred to as "Far America," the Democrats hold about seven seats total in both houses of Congress, "dogs and cats living together, MASS HYSTERIA!!" … I couldn't tell you what major league sports will look like in seven years, but I can tell you this much, at least Anna Kournikova will still be an abysmal tennis player. Take comfort in this.
Bucknell, you've been a great audience. GOOD NIGHT, MIAMI!!!

Fast Facts: Turretman
This merry little blockhead is actually a picture from the first piece of hate mail I received. After printing an article about sportsmanship, referring specifically to someone jumping on another person's back during a basketball game, claiming he had no control over his body and was shouting like he had Tourette's.
A few days later, I received this image through campus mail. A copy-editing mistake (grumble, grumble) let my faux pas slip through and instead of "Tourette's," it read "turrets." The letter cleverly picked up on this and the accompanying picture conveniently demonstrated what a student suffering from "turrets" syndrome might look like.
This image was printed with the rest of my articles for the semester and provided countless hours of entertainment at my laughable gaff.

Best of the NFL predictions

That's right. For those of you who remember, once upon a time I was asked to write predictions for the 2001-2 NFL season. I never took my position seriously and was never asked to return but that doesn't mean there weren't a few sparkling word-gems.

Cleveland at Pittsburgh
In the battle for last, I take Cleveland to lose because I like the color black better than brown. Anyone else noticed that the Cleveland Browns wear orange helmets? Why? If you're going to call them the "Browns" you might as well be consistent. Or maybe while picking the colors for the helmet the guy forgot to check the crayon box to double check his work. Maybe that's what's wrong with the team, everyone's looking to pass to the guy in brown and all they see is orange and they have no idea what to do.

Did you know that King Edward II of England decreed that the inch was to be equal to three barleycorns end to end? That has no relevance to the game, but somehow it's more interesting.

Miami at St. Louis
I've enjoyed Miami ever since Dan Marino left and I've been disappointed with St. Louis ever since Trent Green left. I choose St. Louis anyway because you all thought I would choose Miami and I'm a loose cannon, you never know what I'm gonna do.

[Tiki] Barber is as frail as Calista Flockhart and [Ron] Dayne is as big-boned as Cartman. Put them together and what do you get? One fat slow guy and one fast skinny guy. It's like "Of Mice and Men," only they're both idiots. Still Amani Toomer's name reminds me of Schwarzenegger saying, "It's not a tumor" in "Kindergarten Cop," a delightful action/comedy that reminded us all about the eccentricities of life, and warned us all that "It's a jungle gym out there."

How exactly do you spell Brett's last name? It's spelled Favre but pronounced Farve. Way to give your child an identity complex. I suppose it's better than my plan to name my child Tom but spell it B-O-B. I pick Green Bay but I'm going to spell it B-A-L-T-I-M-O-R-E S-U-C-K-S.

Rich Gannon is the most overrated underrated quarterback. If he is so underrated then why is it that every week I hear people singing his praises? Sounds to me like he's evening out on the ole rating scale. Besides, it's not difficult to throw passes to Jerry Rice and Tim Brown. If the ball doesn't get caught in their wrinkles they can always have their orderlies catch the ball, peel off the skin, mash the ball up into a pasty goo and spoon feed them.

Daunte Culpepper is a machine. He is artificial intelligence in motion. Living proof of the successes of the technological era that we live in. You couldn't take this man down if you wanted to. Luckily for his opponents, he's American-made and has a shelf life equal to his one-year warranty. [How right I was.]

Hmm, working hypothesis: Soft Batch cookies = great. Charlie Batch quarterback = bad. If you were to combine them to make "Soft Charlie Cookieback" you would have a string of words that were utterly nonsensical and useless. Never mind, that didn't work. Umm, how about this … do you think Chicago will beat Detroit? You Batch-a. That was bad too. Yet still better than the Lions.

New York Jets (7-4) at Pittsburgh (9-2)
Ah. The Steelers without the Bus. Oh how I've longed to see this moment. Will Kordell shine in the ultimate test of his skill? As much as I'd hate to put my foot in my mouth (aside from the orthodontic repercussions), Kordell Stewart has forever been, is now and will forever be a worthless bungler, a trogloditic leader and an unholy succubus of skill and experience where time and talent have no meaning and the dark lord Lucifer rides upon a chariot of damnable hell-fire. With that said, I'll probably have to take the Jets.

On hunting for sport
Moving as quietly as you can past roots and fallen branches, caring not to stumble, you realize it's colder than you thought. A gust of wind welcomes you to the open area surrounding the pond. Ducking your head to the water, you lap your tongue, creating ripples that collide with the ones the wind blows. It's a good day.
BLAM! Your skull collapses as the Homady 139 grain boattail spire point bullet from the 7mm Remington Magnum hunting rifle plows through your cranium. Your four legs trumple under your body and you think and feel no more. You are a deer and today starts hunting season. Welcome to America, better wear a cup cause we play hardball:

On baseball playoffs
Atlanta really is the perfect foil for the Yankees. Like Richelieu and Louis XIII, Space Ghost and Zorak or George Bush and a dictionary, George Steinbrenner has Ted Turner nipping at his heels. Steinbrenner probably has Turner's portrait hung over his wall as a reminder of what he can never become. Turner and his Atlanta Braves are living proof that success without rings is not exciting. Atlanta has won 10 division titles in a row but only one ring in that stretch. Where's the enthusiastic support for them? Out tailgating because the flames licking up the side of a Dodge Stratus is more exciting than anything going on in the stadium.

Let the boy play. Let him throw an interception and let him live and laugh and love. Let him grow jaundice and weary with the rigors of professional athletics. Let him grow a beard and let him watch Saturday morning cartoons with a bowl of Crispy Hexagons at the training compound. Let him weep and worry and wallow in every negative article written about his performance. Let him effuse and exalt and effervesce with the joy of every autograph he signs. Let him crash his jeep into trees and pull teammates from burning buildings. For the love of god, let the boy play.

On children in the dugout at the World Series
What is this bourgeoisie culture these people want to graft onto America's proletariat pastime? First it was their hairstyles that felled Jason Giambi's auburn tresses as Steinbrenner demanded his team look clean-cut. Then they went after the uniforms; no more baggy shirts or ripped pants or dirty hats. Sorry guys, you'll have to send the batboys out to do laundry during the seventh inning stretch or you won't be allowed to take the field. Now they're attacking kids in the dugout.

On commentators
It's a wonder that these commentators are less prone to homicide than federal postal workers. Imagine being locked up in a 15-by-10-foot booth with one other person for 81 days a year—he's supposed to be the "funny one," yet the only one laughing is the janitor Meelos who is also in charge of replenishing your free ballpark hot dogs, by the third inning your sidekick is getting edgy, not to mention he's two caffeinated drinks past being legally allowed to operate heavy machinery, but still licensed to drive a Manhattan taxi; he's been spouting nonsensical statistics like the name of the guy who caught six fly balls in a row in a night game back in 19 aught two, and you're both hooked up to microphones that are reaching 50,000 viewers who aren't listening to a word you say because they've all turned the volume down on the television to blast the new Bruce album. Now tell me you're gonna look around your own 150 square feet of Dante's seventh concentric circle and say, "You know, I don't think I want to kill anybody today."

On baseball's imminent strike
As for the rhetoric from players and owners and commissioners about "doing what's best for baseball," you can stick that in a sack. If you keep saying that you'd do anything for the sport you cherish, then how is it I have to fork over my firstborn to get some stadium Skittles: Taste the rainbow of bitterness.
Players, stop whining about your contracts. Your average salary has risen from $1.2 million to $2.4 million since 1994. Meanwhile, the wage necessary to live increased from $17,000 to $21,000 in that same time period. I never want to hear you speak about money again.

Sport—computer video game athletic simulations (i.e. "Madden," "NBA Live")
Just because you sit on your couch, munching puffed Cheez Doodles, chugging Mountain Dew Code Red at 4 in the morning, neglecting personal hygiene, living creatures and the appalling stench emanating from your unwashed body as something out of an epileptic flashback makes you briefly ponder what you're doing in your parents' living room at 29 just before the live-action cut scene fades into the main menu and your bloodshot, arid eyeballs look to each individual oxygen atom, hoping that just one may possess a loose hydrogen like a molecular oasis, doesn't mean that you're not playing a sport. I forgot what my point was, but it's a sport. Now I have to get back to the 14th year of my franchise. Jordan finally retired, but not until 2011.

These unfortunate Faustian sycophants stop at nothing to acquire a healthy balance of sure-fire vets and non-risky rookies. On Barry Bonds
If I were Sigmund Freud, I would say that Barry possesses a latent homosexual desire and a phallic obsession. Not only with commentary that allows one to put "good wood on the ball" or "stroke one long," the bat is a symbol for Barry's little "bonds," and he feels it is the only tool he possesses to acquire power over others. As Teddy Roosevelt said, "Speak softly and carry a big stick and you will go far." For Barry, one out of two ain't bad.
If I were William Shakespeare, I would say, "Spit, yon further friend of Cali be, but live no more to play as thee. Thy glory fleeting, thy candles wrought, for Anaheim's sake, may your bats be rot."
If I were James Joyce, I would say, "Bonds. Clever Irishman. Bat like a raging polygamist swamp-sow cracking nightmares into oceans. Pac Bell. A park on the water. Under. Tow. I gurgle thinking of my dead mother. Usurpation? Nay. Kidneys and domination."
If I were Bob Costas, I would say Barry Bonds reminds me of a very young Joe "Ducky" Medwick. You know, funny story about Ducky … what? What do you mean no one wants to hear my lame stories? But I broadcasted the Olympics.
If I were Albert Camus, I must imagine Barry is happy.

Softball looks to turn around rough season

By Michelle Martin

The softball team dropped four of its last six contests to drop to 8-27 overall and 3-10 in the Patriot League.

The Bison lost 5-3 and 9-0 to Lehigh at home on Sunday. They could not get a hit off of the opposing pitcher in the 9-0, five-inning loss.

Earlier in the day, Bucknell got on the scoreboard first with two runs in the first inning. Meredith Gill '03 reached base on a double and scored when Kris Devore '06 smashed a two-out triple. Devore crossed the plate on a a Jenna Fitch '04 RBI single.

The Mountain Hawks answered right back in the second inning to knot the game at 2. The Bison tacked on another run to go up 3-2 in their half of the frame. Jennifer Ross '06 led off the inning with a double and advanced to third on junior Kristen Potts' sacrifice bunt before scoring on a wild pitch.

Lehigh took the definitive lead in the top of the third inning on a two-run double. Neither squad scored again in the contest to give Bucknell the 5-3 loss. Hurler Kelli Haskins '05 went the distance for the Bison while striking out four.

Bucknell was shut out in the first two games of the series 10-0 and 4-0.

In the nightcap, Lehigh scored a run in the first inning. The Bison threatened in their half of the second with singles from Devore and Fitch, but could not capitalize.

The Mountain Hawks tacked on another run on four hits in the top of the third, and only allowed four Bison baserunners from the third to the sixth innings.

Bucknell again came close to scoring when Ross drew a base-on-balls and Jill Pompeii '05 reached on a single to put runners on first and second. A double play ended the Bison threat and the game, with Lehigh taking the contest 4-0.

Bucknell lost 10-0 in six innings in the first game of the day. Lehigh got on board with two runs on four straight singles in the first inning.

Lauren Wible '06 broke the Lehigh pitcher's no-hitter in the bottom of the fifth with a single to right center. Devore singled to the left side before Alyssa Schneebaum '06 laid down a sacrifice bunt to send the runners to second and third with only one out. The next two batters got out to leave Lehigh unscathed.

The Mountain Hawks scored three runs on three Bison miscues in the top of the sixth to go up 10-0. The Bison got two runners on in the second half of the frame, but made nothing of the opportunity.

Bucknell registered two shutouts of its own on April 16 over visiting George Washington.

In the nightcap of the doubleheader, the Bison walked away with an 8-0 win after five innings. They got on the board with three runs in the second inning. Wible and Ross both drew walks and advanced on a passed ball. Schneebaum ripped a RBI single to left to score Wible. Ross also scored on a GW error at the plate. Schneebaum came in on a wild pitch.

The Bison tacked on two more runs each in the third and fourth innings to stake out a 7-0 lead. One more run was tacked on when Gill singled to start the fifth and scored on a Potts double to end the game due to the eight-run rule. Julie Williams '06 pitched four innings, allowing only one walk while fanning five. Kim Grunwald '06 made her first pitching appearance of the season in the fifth inning and struck out one.

Lauren Box '03 pitched a two-hit shutout earlier in the day as the Bison won 7-0. They scored first in the bottom of the third on three hits and two Colonial errors. Angela Stackhouse '04 nailed a two-out single to left field. Wible followed with a single to right and advanced to third on an error. Stackhouse scored on the error. Wible crossed the plate on a Devore RBI single up the middle.

The Orange and Blue scored the rest of their runs in the bottom of the sixth. Devore led off with a double and scored on a Ross single. Christina Gilbert '06 drew a two-out walk and Pompeii reached base on a single. Gilbert scored when Gill doubled down the left field line, and Pompeii reached home when Potts hit a RBI single. Stackhouse drew a base-on-balls to load the bases, and a wild pitch advanced all three runners, bringing Gill in. Potts scored on another GW wild pitch. Box sat down all three batters she faced in the seventh to preserve the shutout.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Jill Pompeii '05 knocks out a single to put runners on first and second in a recent game against Lehigh. The Bison could not capitalize on the hit.

Head Coach Janelle Breneman was pleased with the team's play.

"We played really well against GW. We played solid defense, only committing one error on the day," Breneman said.

She also commended Gill, Devore and Schneebaum on their offense during the two games. Gill went three for six on the day. Devore ripped a double and a RBI single in the first game, and Schneebaum had a RBI single in the nightcap.

With the end of the season rapidly approaching, it is nearly time to say goodbye to another group of seniors. The Bison will be losing Box, Gill and Brandi Porter.

> "Being a student-athlete is a unique college experience because from the moment you arrive on campus you're part of something. You have a group of people who are willing to support and help you, and that's really made all the difference for me."
> —Brandi Porter '03

Box has been the No. 2 pitcher for the Bison for the past three years. In her junior campaign, she started in all but five of the games that she appeared in and had a career-best 11 complete games.

She pitched only one wild pitch during her entire sophomore season while tossing nine complete games, and pitched Bucknell's only win in the Patriot League Tournament in her first year.

Gill is also concluding an impressive four-year career. She has been one of the leading hitters throughout her career. She led the team in scoring as a junior, slugged a team-high and Patriot League second-high eight triples as a sophomore and snatched the five spot on Bucknell's top 10 all-time list for doubles in a season as a rookie.

Porter has been the Orange and Blue's pitching ace. She broke her own season strikeout record in her junior campaign with 104 strikeouts, after taking the Bucknell record the first time as a sophomore. She was named to the Patriot League second team twice and was MVP for the Bison in her rookie year.

Softball has been a huge part of all three student-athlete's growth in the last four years. Between becoming team leaders, making lasting friendships and excelling in the academics here, their experiences and lessons here will not be easily forgotten.

"I've … learned a lot about time management from trying to balance school work and my athletic schedule. I've also formed some invaluable friendships which I plan to continue after I leave," Box said.

Porter described the advantages of being a student-athlete.

"Being a student athlete is a unique college experience because from the moment you arrive on campus you're part of something. You have a group of people who are willing to support and help you, and I think that's really made all the difference for me," Porter said.

All three have impressive plans for their post-Commencement lives. Box has taken a job as a financial analyst for Campbell Soup and Gill has an accounting job lined up. Porter will be interning at Merck for the summer before starting a Ph.D. program in chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania.

by the second and third place finishes of Rachel Tutmaher '06 and Alison Cole '06. The Bison also got a win from Kiley MacDonald '05 in the 400-meter hurdles.

Other Bison of note included second-place finishes by Jen Marsh '05, Robin Meling '04 and Jamie Gow '06 in the 1,500-meter, long jump and 3,000-meter steeplechase, respectively. Gow led a two through six place effort by Bucknell in the steeplechase.

The women also got help from volleyball star Brandi Trapasso '04, who tied for second in the high jump. In her first season of track since high school, Trapasso has become the Bison's top high jumper.

Brady was very happy with performances of the women.

"I think the women's team looked great this weekend. Everyone got out there and competed, and that's what Coach wants us to do. All of us are right on track for competing at leagues," Brady said.

The Bison now begin preparations for the Patriot League meet in two weeks. A portion of the team will be getting a last chance to tune up at the College of New Jersey this weekend, another portion will be resting, while a third portion will be competing in the Penn Relays between Thursday and Saturday of this week.

Maria Garcia '04 helped the effort by throwing a huge school record to win the hammer (180-11). Garcia, already an NCAA regional qualifier, improved her best by over eight feet.

Women's tennis clinches Patriot League playoff berth

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bison women's tennis team secured a Patriot League Playoff berth with a win over Lehigh 4-1. The team earned the fourth and final spot in the tournament and will face off against No. 1-seeded Army at 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The Mountain Hawks, who entered the match in the same must-win situation as the Orange and Blue, came out strong in doubles play. Their number three tandem made quick work of Bison's Samantha Berthod '03 and Rheanna Gaskin '03 in an 8-2 win.

It appeared as if Lehigh was going to win the doubles point, with both one and two doubles teams leading the Bison at one point. The number one duo of Veronica Brown '06 and Nadezda Curcic '05 refused to go down, winning five straight games after trailing 6-3 to win 8-6. Tanya Sichko '05 and Jill Wurzburg '03 made a similar move, coming back from a 5-3 deficit to win 8-5 at the third flight, and secure the doubles point.

Lehigh got on the board with a win 6-0, 6-2 win over Curcic at number one, but that was as close as the Mountain Hawks would get.

Brown handled her opponent in a 6-4, 6-1 second flight win, while Wurzburg earned a 6-4, 6-1 win at number three to finish the regular-season of her final year as a dual winner.

Sichko secured the match with a 6-1, 6-2 victory at number four. The five and six singles bouts were not finished because the Bison had already won the match.

fortable in the fourth, as the Bison tacked on another pair of runs.A Phil Bunting '04 single, a Steve Stutzman '04 double, a Stoll single and an Army error allowed the Bison to pick up a 6-0 lead.

The squad did more damage in the fifth, plating three runs. Krentzman was hit by a pitch again, and an error and a balk put Walter and Krentzman on second and third, respectively, before Matt Capece '06 scored Krentzman with a single. After Bunting was hit by a pitch, Stoll scored Walter with a sacrifice fly. A Moss single and a walk to Day sent Capece home to score the ninth and final run of the rout.

Army broke up Allen's no-hitter in the sixth, but Allen thwarted the Black Knights efforts for the rest of the game and closed out the seventh with a pair of strikeouts and ground out.

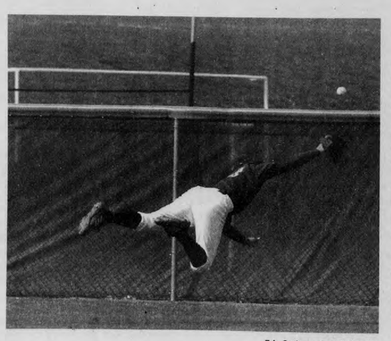
His performance, along with the outstanding team effort, provided a defining game for the team.

"We got an incredible outing from Zach," Ciccione said. "Our offense started clicking, and our defense played well."

Grant was impressed with the game as well.

"Zach Allen threw a gem on Sunday and we were able to have an offensive explosion," Grant said.

The second game of the day saw the Bison jump out to a 3-0 lead, but the Bison were unable to hang on after a ferocious Army rally in the final two innings of the game. The Bison were tenacious all day, but Army secured a win with a three-run homer in the seventh.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Kyle Walter '06 makes a valiant effort to catch a ball hit deep to center field. Walter didn't make the catch, but got a glove on the ball, knocking it down and throwing it in to hold the Army batter to a double.

"We were beaten in game four by a relentless effort by Army," Depew said. "They really competed to the very end and I give them a lot of credit for their performance."

Futrick entered the game looking for his record-breaking 10th save, but gave up three runs with two outs in the seventh inning to take his first loss.

Ciccione isn't worried about Futrick's ability to bounce back.

"He is a tough kid and will respond well," Ciccione said. "I have all the confidence in the world in him and he'll be out there soon to get that record."

Co-captain Zach Allen '03 said that despite the loss, the Bison came out of the weekend with a lot of positives.

"We played tough and competed in all four games," Allen said. "The game we lost should serve as a lesson for us and help us put teams away in the future."

The Bison will try to clinch the division title when they face Lafayette on April 26 and 27. The four-game series takes place at home and starts at noon on both days.

"We are geared up for Lafayette knowing that if we take three of four we will be crowned conference champs, bringing the Patriot League tournament to our house," Burns said.

Grant also said that it will be an intense series.

"Every game against Lafayette has serious postseason implications," Grant said. We're going to treat this weekend like the first round of the playoffs."

Ciccione is not worried about the team's ability to get things done against Lafayette.

"We control our own destiny and I am confident that we will go out and clinch the home-field advantage for the playoffs this weekend," Ciccione said.

Coach of the Year

Bison swimmers sweep Patriot League Championships

After bringing Patriot League titles to both the men's and women's swim team for the first time in University history, The Bucknellian awards Head Coach Jerry Foley the Coach of the Year

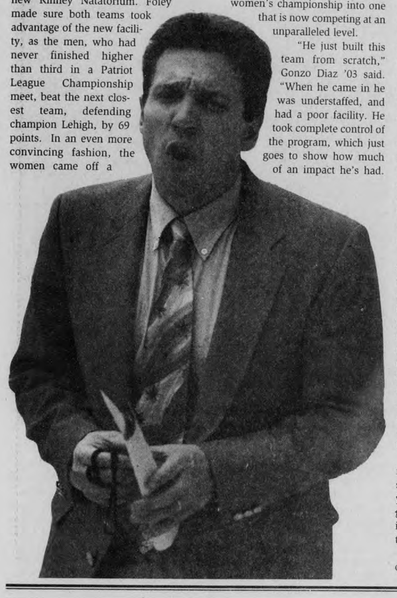
By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

In the most monumental season in the University swimming program's history, the Bison men and women swept the Patriot League Championship titles in dominating fashion this year. For the feat, Head Coach Jerry Foley, who joined the University five years ago, deservingly won Patriot League Coach of the Year for both the men's and women's swimming and diving teams.

For the first time since 1969 the University held a swimming championship, which took place in the brand new Kinney Natatorium. Foley made sure both teams took advantage of the new facility, as the men, who had never finished higher than third in a Patriot League Championship meet, beat the next closest team, defending champion Lehigh, by 69 points. In an even more convincing fashion, the women came off a never before accomplished undefeated dual meet season, propelling them to a win by more than 237 points over Navy, the defending Patriot League champions and second-place finisher this year.

The accomplishment of both teams winning their respective championships is something that no other University has been able to do in the history of the Patriot League. The recent success involved a process that began long before the beginning of this season. Five years ago, Foley was hired as head coach and started the transformation of a program that hadn't ever experienced a men's or women's championship into one that is now competing at an unparalleled level.

"He just built this team from scratch," Gonzo Diaz '03 said. "When he came in he was understaffed, and had a poor facility. He took complete control of the program, which just goes to show how much of an impact he's had. When he made the team his, that's when we got the championships."



Foley's first task when he came to the University was to recruit what is now this year's seniors, a group of athletes that bought into Foley's coaching style and have helped take the program to where it is today. On the women's side Rebecca Dolan '03, Darby Golino '03 and Lauren Mosler '03 will graduate. Dolan won several events in the 200-meter fly throughout the year and contributed to the 800-meter free relay. Golino set the University record in the 200 back in the final day of championships.

The men were led by Michael Guskey '03, Diaz, Chris Feinthel '03, Geoffrey Konopka '03, Kurt McCoy '03, Stelios Saffos '03 and Stephen Schwanhausser '03. Guskey won several 50-meter and 100-meter breast events, while contributing to the 400-meter medley relay that broke the University record, and Feinthel placed all year long in backstroke events.

"The preparation for this year's success started five years ago when I recruited that class," Foley said. "Championship teams are made by senior leadership, and we had that this year across the board, which made a huge difference. They've also been nicely complemented by some talented young athletes along the way."

By adhering to a rigorous off-season workout program that included weight training and practices, the men's and women's teams knew from the beginning that their dedication this year would pay off and could turn into something special. Foley has coached swimming for 17 years and 12 at the collegiate level and understands the importance of having disciplined swimmers. With the help of a devoted senior class, Foley made sure that every team member was committed to the winning attitude that he insisted they have.

"The biggest thing Foley has done is that he's implemented rules and stuck to them. It hasn't mattered if you're the fastest guy or the slowest guy, the rules have applied. There was integrity to that, and we bought into it this year," Chris Feinthel said.

Foley also stresses the importance of technique during practice, which was a determining factor in improving times among the swimmers throughout the season. In a sport in which winners can be separated from losers by even fractions of a second, a good coach that knows how to teach speed is critical.

"My times have already improved a lot. He's made a huge impact not just on me, but also on the rest of the swimmers he coaches, and it shows through the results," Jackie Feinthel '05 said.

As both teams started their final phases of transformation from mediocrity to a championship-caliber level, so too was the facility in which they swam being built into something monumental. In the fall the teams practiced in Freas-Rooke Pool, until one day they made history by entering the new Olympic-size Kinney Natatorium at 6 a.m. for practice. Although they could only dream of it at the time, this would be the site where even more history would unravel, as both teams would go on to break several University records and set the ultimate accomplishment of sweeping the Patriot League Championships.

"We were fortunate that as we went along, we received the right amount of support from the University," Foley said. "The facility was the final piece for our program in bringing it to this level and beyond. Not just the pool, but the new varsity weight room, which the athletes understand and appreciate the importance of."

As with all great season the teams did have to overcome some adversity in their quest to take full advantage of the opportunities that this year presented.

While the women's team steamrolled through its competition, going 7-0 in the regular season, the men dropped two meets around the middle of the season to league foes Army and American. The Bison men knew that they would have a chance to face these teams again in championships, and that if they worked under Foley's plan they could improve enough to get revenge.

After the final regular season win over defending Patriot League Champions Lehigh, the men had a feeling that they could take the confidence they gained from the win into the tournament and pull it out. Through Foley's coaching, the team's times improved enough to win the championship.

"It's one thing to talk about it, it's another to have what it takes to go out there and do it," Foley said.

The seniors expected coming in to be able to compete with anyone, and when it was all said and done they finally accomplished what they set out to do after four years of hard work.

"No one says coming into a season that they won't be able to do it," Chris Feinthel said. "After the middle of the season losses we had our doubts, but we just kept gaining confidence and it eventually happened."

With the incredible season for both the men and women the program is at an all-time high, and with the experienced Foley now in full control of the future, it appears as though the Bison will continue to enjoy the same kind of success for years to come.

"I've seen a total change in the culture of this team," Foley said. "They now have a championship attitude. The classes underneath the seniors have now seen the commitment and dedication it takes to make it happen."

Futrick ties single season Patriot League record for saves

The Bucknellian honors first-year pitcher Phil Futrick with Male Rookie of the Year

By Ainsley Maloney
Staff Writer

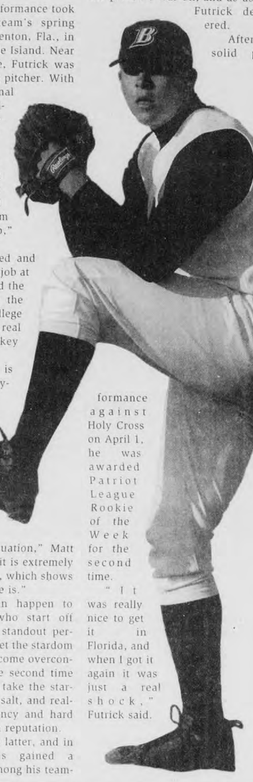
When Phil Futrick '06 made the Bison baseball team in the fall, he only had one goal: to get any amount of playing time he could possibly receive. Little did he know that his first collegiate appearance on March 17 would honor him Patriot League Rookie of the Week. Repeated solid performances would allow him to continue appearing in almost every game that followed.

Futrick's first performance took place during the team's spring training trip in Bradenton, Fla., in a game against Rhode Island. Near the end of the game, Futrick was put in as the closing pitcher. With two outs in the final inning, Futrick needed to secure the third out to win the game.

"I was a little nervous, but with the season just beginning, I knew I had to show them what I could do," Futrick said.

By staying focused and concentrating on the job at hand, Futrick secured the win, which marked the first save of his college career and his first real recognition as a key asset to the team.

"Being a closer is really tough for anybody because you have to come into the game in a tight situation," Matt Daley '04 said. "But it is extremely tough for a freshman, which shows you just how good he is."



A great deal can happen to first-year athletes who start off their season with a standout performance. They can let the stardom go to their heads, become overconfident and choke the second time around; or they can take the stardom with a grain of salt, and realize it takes consistency and hard work to really earn a reputation.

Futrick chose the latter, and in doing so, he has gained a respectable image among his teammates.

"[Futrick] has not let his success go to his head and has continued to work just as hard as he did from day one of practice in the fall," Ben Stoll '04 said. "He is very well-liked by his teammates and has earned their respect both on and off the field."

The remaining challenge was earning respect among the baseball community, and Futrick knew it would take more than one big performance to do so. Needless to say, the pressure was on, and as usual, Futrick delivered.

After a solid performance against Holy Cross on April 1, he was awarded Patriot League Rookie of the Week for the second time.

"It was really nice to get it in Florida, and when I got it again it was just a real shock," Futrick said.

Overall, Futrick has appeared in 12.1 innings and broke the Bucknell school save record with a total of seven. He then moved on to tie the Patriot League record with nine saves.

"Setting records like he was doing as a freshman gives you some kind of idea of what kind of pitcher he will mature into during his Bucknell career," Corey Nadler '04 said.

The steps he has made as a first-year student have impressed everyone. There are many difficulties that come along with adjusting to college athletics, and Futrick has made the transition seem relatively easy and painless.

> "Futrick has accomplished more as a freshmen than any other pitcher in the league," Depew said. "In almost every appearance the game is on the line and he has to produce. He has done this with exceptional composure and focus."
> —Gene Depew, Head Coach

"Coming out of high school where you are used to being a stud starter to a Division I college baseball program is a very tough adjustment to make," Kevin Burns '03 said. "The thing that is most impressive about Phil is that he did it in three months as opposed to three years."

Head Coach Gene Depew said he is equally as impressed with Futrick's accomplishments and the level of dependability he has allowed the team to comfortably place on him.

"[Futrick] has accomplished more as a freshmen than any other pitcher in the league," Depew said. "In almost every appearance the game is on the line and he has to produce. He has done this with exceptional composure and focus."

In fact, one of Futrick's best qualities is his ability to handle pressure from the entire team. No matter what the situation, Futrick manages to stay focused and uses any nervous energy to his advantage.

"It helps me to be nervous because me makes me play a little bit better," Futrick said. "I really just concentrate on what I have to do and try to stay focused."

Assistant Coach Rick Ciccione, who has spent a great deal of time with the pitchers, praised Futrick's ability to handle tough situations and his determination to improve his game.

"The kid is immune to pressure [and] has been an absolute workhorse for us this season," Ciccione said. "He is one of the most coachable kids we have on this team and has been a pleasure to work with."

Ciccione also said that he recognizes Futrick's ability to maintain two different temperaments on and off the field, making him both a friendly teammate as well as a competitive player.

"While he is always smiling off the field, when he takes the mound he is as fierce a competitor as I have coached," Ciccione said.

Similarly, Futrick feels that every member of the team also embodies these characteristics, and considers them the main reasons for the team's great chemistry.

"Before practice we're joking around, but once the game hits we're all focused on what we have to do," Futrick said.

It is the camaraderie and strength of the team that Futrick feels is its main asset—and also its main ticket to a Patriot League championship title. With a current undefeated Patriot League record and only one more series to go against Lafayette, the top playoff spot is in close reach. If they secure that, the championship title will be even closer.

"I'm very happy with the way the season's going so far," Futrick said. "Especially coming into the season picked to finish fifth. We knew we had the talent to do what we did, it was just up to us to go out there and play."

According to Depew, Futrick has been a key part to the team's success, and should the Bison advance to regional competition, many teammates are confident in Futrick's abilities.

"I have never in my life had this much confidence giving the ball to another pitcher in the late innings than I do in Phil," Burns said.

Beyond this season, Futrick's expectations for the following year remain modest. With possibly all of the four starting pitchers leaving, Futrick is unsure whether the coaches will want him starting or closing as a sophomore. Whichever the case, Futrick is determined to adjust to the coaches requests as best he can.

"If he wants me to start, I have to get my arm used to throwing more than one or two innings," Futrick said. "Either way I'm going to work hard over the summer for whatever they're gonna need me to do."

No one doubts his ability to switch from closer to starter for the next season. In fact, few doubt his ability to do just about anything.

"Phil has already accomplished so many great things in his rookie season," Burns said. "With his work ethic, the sky is the limit for this kid."

Altman captures a pair of gold medals in Patriot League Championships

The Bucknellian awards first-year sensation Lectie Altman Female Rookie of the Year

By Stephen Schwanhausser
Staff Writer

It's 4:30 in the afternoon on a beautiful spring Tuesday. You might think after being crowned champion in the 200-yard freestyle along the way to bringing home the first women's Patriot League team title Lectie Altman '06 might be out relaxing in the sun. Think again. Champions are made of tougher stuff than that.

Lectie is known to be nothing but a passionate, dedicated athlete. As a swimmer myself, the first time I met Lectie was on her recruiting trip at Bucknell last year. I recall little about that introduction, yet was made acutely aware of her perseverance this summer when I met her at the United States Swimming Sectional Championships in Buffalo, N.Y. She had a quiet, shy way about her when I introduced myself, then she jumped in the pool. It is easier to see a person's true motivation when nobody is watching. Lectie took the summer after her senior year in high school and prepared for the upcoming season, and it most certainly paid off.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Lectie Altman '06 receives one of her four medals in the Patriot League Championships.

A native of Syracuse, N.Y., Lectie swam for the Chargers in high school. Coming into college she was already an established athlete, having achieved national time standards.

"Lectie was one of our top recruits for the 2002-2003 season. We expected her to be a strong contributor in both the backstroke and freestyle events and an essential component to our relay teams," Head Coach Jerry Foley said.

Lectie certainly stepped into her space accordingly—the season was opened with Bucknell's inter-squad meet and Lectie got three wins in the 100 and 200 backstrokes and the 200 freestyle. Her summer training continued to pay off as the women entered their dual meet season.

Against opponent Drexel, Lectie was put in both mid-distance freestyle events, the 200 and 500, and in her first collegiate competition, brought home back-to-back golds.

At home the Bison held a Sprint Invitational in the brand new Kinney Natatorium. Surprising everyone, Lectie set a new pool record in the 100 backstroke with a time of 58.84, which is incredibly fast for such and early season meet.

"I had confidence in Lectie from the beginning, but I distinctly remember her 100 back at the invite, my faith in her ability to perform in season was sealed and being able to count on her gave me great flexibility in my lineups throughout the year," Foley said.

Foley's solid belief was not to be disappointed. The following meet was against Patriot League rivals Navy and American in a double-dual setup. Lectie had a tough race in the 200 freestyle, but came out on top with an incredible time of 1:54.87.

It was at this point in the season that the coaching staff began to realize that Lectie was not simply a mediocre freestyler and her training plan was adjusted.

"Jerry decided to split my time in the pool. I had been training exclusively in the stroke group, but he wanted to dedicate a few days a week to distance freestyle," Lectie said. "This was a huge benefit, I was able to train with new people and a different coach. Throughout my career before college I had been doing the same thing every year, the opportunity to train in new environments daily really helped me develop."

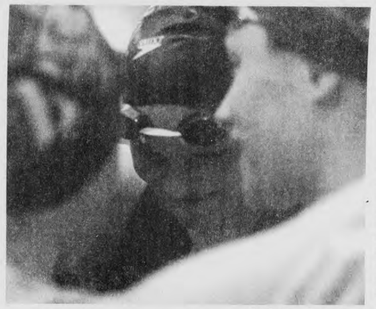
Lectie finished up the first semester season with first and second finishes against Army in the 200 free and the 500 free, respectively, and a third-place finish in the 200 backstroke at the Bucknell Invitational in December.

Over winter break the team went to Naples, Fla., for a training trip.

"Before we left everyone was talking about how hard it would be, and it was tough, but the coaches never gave us anything we couldn't handle, they took us to the edge and that was what we needed," Lectie said. "We trained long course (50 meters) in the morning which I hate, but it provided me with a really strong base which came through at the end of the year."

Training trip is a time not only for individual improvements, but for team bonding as well. I asked Lectie to sum up her year up to this point.

"The girls were all really nice at the beginning of the year, but I didn't feel close to them till after training trip. We really came together after living together and training so hard," Lectie said. "I think my class became more tightknit, but I felt like the upperclassmen were more accepting as well. Without our time in Florida, I don't think our season would have been as tremendous as it was."



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Lectie Altman '06 comes together with teammates before the final day of swimming. Altman captured two gold medals, one silver and one bronze.

As second-semester competition began with Patriot League opponent Lafayette, Lectie won the 200 backstroke and finished second in the 200 free. The following weekend was a travel meet to Colgate University.

Lectie said of her favorite in-season race, "It was the 200 backstroke—there wasn't a lot of competition, but it was someone else's pool. I don't know, the new environment or my training, it was my best time before Patriots and it just sticks out in my head."

Rightly so—Lectie touched the wall in 2:06.71 for a win with a second-place finish in the 200 free. With just one dual meet left before the championships, Foley said that Lectie began to struggle.

"She kind of hit a wall before Lehigh. I've seen this with a lot of freshman. It's a long season at that point and the pressure of championships coming weighs on them," Foley said. "I was not concerned, I knew she would swim well at the end."

For any average swimmer, two seconds and a third-place finish are hardly a wall, yet Lehigh was the only dual meet this season in which Lectie did not win an event.

As the team entered the Patriot League Championships, confidence was high and both Lectie and the team performed with style.

> "I had confidence in Lectie from the beginning, but my faith in her ability to perform was sealed early in the season."
> —Jerry Foley, head coach

Lectie had a career-best time in the 100 backstroke when she finished in 57.84 and placed third. In the 200 backstroke it was a race to the finish with teammate and captain Darby Golino '03.

"Darby and I have a very competitive relationship. I came in on her turf and I'm not sure she really liked it, but in the end we were really able to push each other. I was incredibly pleased with my time. It was a life-time-best for me and I would never have gotten there if I hadn't had such a great race," Lectie said.

Golino finished second behind Golino in a time of 2:02.66, a best by nearly three seconds.

Lectie's crowning achievement came in the 200 freestyle. An event she had come to treasure over the season, it turned out to be the ace in her sleeve at Championships. She was pitted against teammate Jen Cancro '04, a well-known backhalf swimmer.

"After 100 yards I was ahead, but I was thinking to myself, 'I know Jen is coming, we are gonna go 1-2.' We pushed each other the last four laps and when I touched the wall and looked up at the clock I realized that we had," Lectie said.

Lectie came out of the race on top, and became Patriot League Champion. By the time the meet was over she walked away with three medals, a team title and a slot on the All-Patriot League Team.

Looking back on the season Lectie attributed her success to a new environment, new training partners and a unique training program. She was pleased with her first Patriot League win.

"It was crazy. I was really surprised and was very satisfied with my times. I hadn't been able to break my best times since sophomore year in high school and it was great to break them at Patriots," Lectie said.

Foley said he is impressed with Lectie's dedication to training.

"Lectie is an incredible trainer. She does all the work behind the scenes which leads to real success. She is a low-maintenance athlete—we are able to point her in the right direction and know she will get there. She is also so flexible, never complaining or dictating to us what she wants to do. We put her where we need her and know that she will perform," Foley said. "Perhaps best of all, she is extremely modest."

From here, Lectie is headed back in the pool, training for the summer season and her sophomore year. Lectie aims to make "B" cut standards for the NCAA Championship, which she hopes to attend while here. Her greatest challenge?

"Classes—I had to take organic chem for two semesters, and that was really hard for me. Now that's out of the way, and I can concentrate on other things," Lectie said.

Walking away from swimming and Bucknell, I am able to brag I competed with Lectie before she moved on campus. Her quiet attitude and rock solid perseverance will serve her team for years to come. Good luck, Lectie.

Male Athletes of the Year

The Bucknellian honors the entire Bison pitching staff with the Male Athlete of the Year award

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

There's been a lot of capital punishment going on in Lewisburg lately, and it has nothing to do with the State Penitentiary. The maximum security prison doesn't even have a death row. The Bucknell baseball team, on the other hand, does.

When it comes to laying down the law on opposing batters, the Bison pitching staff will settle for nothing less than execution. The 13 pitchers refer to themselves as "Death Row," an appropriate moniker for a unit that has been simply punishing opposing offenses.

The staff's 3.53 earned-run average as of April 21 put them on top of the Patriot League's ERA rankings. Over the course of the 2003 season, that number has been as low as 3.12, which placed them 11th in NCAA Division I rankings for ERA, in the company of some of the best staffs in the country.

In addition to that outstanding statistic, the squad leads the league in wins and saves and has surrendered the fewest hits, runs and earned runs of any Patriot League team.

"Our season has been tremendous so far," co-captain Zach Allen '03 said. "I can't give enough credit to the guys for their hard work and dedication."

The team's main starting rotation of Allen, R.J. Grant '03, Kevin Burns '03 and Kevin Miller '04 have been consistent and durable, staying on the mound for 159 innings—about six innings per start—and have combined for an ERA of 3.05 through last weekend's series against Army.

Opponents can't catch a break from the bullpen, either. The pen has 13 saves to its credit, nine of which belong to sensational rookie Phil Futrick '06.

"This is the most solid and deep pitching we have had," Head Coach Gene Depew said. "Their performance has been the key to our season."

The Bison's powerful arsenal is among the league's most respected this year, but that respect hasn't come easily.

Back in February, the rest of the league had all but written off the Bison as legitimate contenders. The attention was instead focused on defending league champion Navy, who was the definitive choice to take the title again in 2003, and second-choice Army. Bucknell was shuffled near the bottom of the predicted rankings.

The voters probably assumed that the Bison would be the same 15-35 team that they were last season, a year in which the staff compiled a league-low 6.67 ERA and topped the league in hits, runs, earned runs and walks surrendered. But the team wasn't about to submit to those expectations, and the pitching staff set out to turn the reputation around.

"We knew that we had to completely change everything from last season in order to be competitive this year," Grant said.

While the rest of the league was counting them out, the Bison pitchers were grinding their way through off-season conditioning and strength training, and most importantly, doing it all as one unit.

"At the beginning of the year, the staff came together as one, and vowed to work harder and pitch better than any other staff in the league," Burns said.

The staff is easy to spot during their conditioning workouts, as they all don the same camouflage T-shirts—a sign of their dedication to sacrificing and working together in order to be contenders against gritty league opponents Army and Navy.

"We wanted to get the same type of attitude that Army and Navy have when they workout," Grant said. "Their workouts are usually the most intense of any other Patriot League team and we knew that in order to be competitive and challenge them, we had to work even harder than them. Basically it gave us the mindset to get us through each day's conditioning."

Among the key impetuses behind the success and effectiveness of the off-season and in-season training programs is the effort of Pitching Coach Rick Ciccione. Ciccione, who is in his second year of coaching, designed the workouts to give the pitchers the physical base necessary to achieve a new level of performance.

"[The success] is also a credit to pitching coach Rick Ciccione, who has done an excellent job of preparing this staff," Depew said.

The players' willingness to adhere to rigorous training and to dedicate themselves to becoming the toughest staff in the league set the stage for a vastly improved season.

To simply call this season an improvement would be an understatement, though. The Bison pitchers haven't just been respectable; they've maintained a stranglehold on the teams that were supposed to blow them out of the water in the standings.

"We knew when the season began that we had a deep and more than talented pitching staff, but in no way could I have foreseen what this staff has accomplished," Burns said.

Pitching has become the staple for the Bison, a team that is now staring down a Patriot League title and serious playoff expectations.

"Coming into this year we knew that our staff would be the strength of this team, but for them to have been this outstanding consistently is better than anyone could have dreamt," Ciccione said.

The Bison's explosive start was delayed several times by a barrage of unseasonal weather—the first 10 games of the year were canceled—but the hurlers took it in stride, waiting until spring training to kick off their breakout season.

The Bison swept Bloomsberg and Lehigh in their first homestand of the year before heading out on a road trip that saw the pitchers make a strong statement in the Patriot League. In series against Holy Cross, Lehigh and highly-touted Navy, the Bison starters earned nine wins and the bullpen converted eight of eight save opportunities.

The squad then returned to Lewisburg, where they took two of four from Army, staying on track to secure homefield advantage for the playoffs.

The starting four have notched six complete games, including complete game shutouts by Miller and Allen.

With the efficiency of the starters, the bullpen has been more idle than in past years, especially with midweek games getting canceled as the season went on.

"As a reliever it is nice to be able to sit back and watch the starters dominate," Cory Nadler '05 said. "A reliever is just there in case they are needed, and it is nice when we are not needed—that means that the team is doing well."

Despite the somewhat limited use of the bullpen, the relievers have managed to add plenty of highlights of their own to the season.

Futrick tied a Patriot League record for saves and was eighth in the nation in that category after April 13, while Matt Daley '05 has brought home three saves for the team. Lefties Tim Peacock '05 and Nadler have been assets as well.

Although many of the team's future arms weren't getting a chance at valuable game experiences until a couple weeks ago, the staff's patience and maturity has kept the team's unity from suffering.

"They understand that it is a selfless attitude that has gotten us to this point, and it is that attitude that will hopefully get us back to the dance," Ciccione said.

Recent midweek games have given more members of the staff a chance to log innings, as Nadler, Nick Yaeger '05, Eric Steinbach '05, Jon Black '06, Marc Cussatt '06 and Jacob Moss '06 have all gotten in work during games again Duquesne and Penn State.

Regardless of who starts or pitches the most innings, the staff functions as a group of equals, rather than as individuals.

"It doesn't matter if you're the first guy in the rotation or the last guy off the bench, we're a staff of 13, not four," Grant said. "There is no special treatment, and if you want to be a part of the staff, you have to work as hard as the next guy, no matter what."

A crucial part of the staff's success is also due to the excellent work from the other half of the battery—catcher Phil Bunting '05.

"Phil Bunting has been amazing behind the plate because he has a great sense for the game and knows what pitch to call in every situation," Daley said.

The team heads into its last Patriot League series of the regular season with an 11-6 intraleague record—one game ahead of preseason frontrunner Navy as the postseason approaches.

"We have been throwing the ball well all year and need to finish the job by winning the tournament," Allen said.

Chances are, "Death Row" will be as harsh on the next set of batters as it has been on the rest of its opponents, which should provide for an electrifying postseason.

Abroad in London, England

By Ashwin Ramakrishna
Contributing Writer

Rich in the country's history, London has been the main city of England for countless years. The city of London, while only a square mile in size, encompasses some of the greatest wealth and culture in the world. Just walking about the streets I found myself thinking back to the dynasties of the Tudors, Stuarts and the Georgians. This city was so rich in history that could be seen everywhere. The Tower of London, Westminster Abbey and the Monument to the Halls of Parliament all were awaiting my exploration. It was almost like I was a tourist for the duration of a semester, not a student.

I arrived in London's Heathrow Airport at a painful 6 a.m. from my transatlantic flight out of JFK. We had been told to get sleep on the plane so that we could try and acquaint ourselves with Greenwich Mean Time, but of course I slept for the total of maybe an hour. As Adrienne Freidi '04 and Jenn Onka '04 may tell you, that was a mistake.

Arriving in Heathrow early in the morning, being forced in a huge line for immigration and customs and then figuring out where and whom we had to meet was not an easy task. Nonetheless it allowed for time to met, compiain with and get to know other students, since we had all flown in on the grop flight.

The first two weeks consisted of an orientation, serviced by our host Arcadia University Program, which allowed us to better acquaint ourselves with those attending Queen Mary College. As the semester progressed, I made a very close group of friends to share in the fun and splendor of London as well as Europe: Brie Riemer, Nora McIntire, Shawn Brady, Jannah Cornell and Frank Harrell.

My experiences within London were eclectic, from night walks along the river Thames with Brie, attending a House of Commons debate over U.N. Resolution 1441, laughing on the beefeater tour at the Tower of London, seeing the sword that knighted my great-grandfather in Buckingham Palace and enjoying the hit musical "Chicago" on stage.

While I will never forget those experiences, one of my most memorable experiences was the Thanksgiving that my friends and I shared. Throughout the week I had been walking all over the city going into areas that I had not previously visited, all in search of a few key ingredients for Thanksgiving dinner—the canned pumpkin for pie, the fresh cranberries for homemade cranberry sauce and, of course, the perfect turkey.

Although it was a very strenuous and taxing time for me, I was incredibly

Town Arts Festival: coming to a Market Street near you

With art exhibits and hands-on workshops, the festival showcases local talents

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

The 34th annual Lewisburg Arts Festival is taking place this week, highlighting local artists and community groups. Running today through May 4, the festival's theme is "Through a Child's Eyes."

Featured artist Catherine D. Hafer, who provided the piece from which the theme was adapted, will present an exhibit until May 3 in the Faustina Gallery on Market Street.

"Each year we feature a local artist for the festival," Lewisburg Arts Council President Grace Mahon said. "The artist gives us a focal point from which to come up with a theme. This year, that artist was Cathy Hafer."

According to the Arts Council's schedule of events, "Her style is the result of many years of refining her drawing skills, combined with the expressive use of color, to capture, not only the physical characteristics of the subject but also the feelings associated with each work, creating a truly complete representation of the artist's intention for the piece."

Throughout the week, the Arts Council is sponsoring several hands-on workshops to kick off the festivities. The Highlands Pub is hosting a culinary workshop, "Soups Made with Beer" Monday. Maggie Belisle is hosting "Fools Like Me," a poetry workshop focused on the "celebration of words," Tuesday. Wednesday's workshops include a class on clay building taught by Eileen Keefer, as well as a session on framing techniques taught by Hafer. On Thursday, the workshop series will conclude with a piñata-making class in honor of Cinco de Mayo.

Tomorrow marks the highlight of the Arts Festival. In the morning, community members are invited to a pancake breakfast sponsored by the Lewisburg Kiwanis Club. The annual Children's Pet Parade kicks off at 10 a.m., featuring an array of the area's pets in costumes.

"The pet parade is absolutely hysterical," Mahon said.

The Market Street Arts Festival runs tomorrow from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. This event features over 100 of the area's finest artists and over 30 food vendors, as well as a number of non-profit information tables.

This year, the Arts Festival includes several University student groups. The Bucknell Tuba Quartet will present a concert at 11:30 a.m. tomorrow at the M&T Bank Food Court. The group consists of Phil Wetzel '04 and Professor of Civil and Environmental Engineering Aarne Vesilind on the euphonium and Christopher Styers '05 and Jon Rabin '03 on the tuba.

The University Gospel Choir will sing at the Hufnagle Park Food Court at noon tomoorw. Jelani, the University's hip-hop dance group and step team, will be performing at 12:30 p.m. in Soldier's Park. Two Past Midnight, the University's co-ed a capella group, will present a concert from 2:30-3 p.m. in the Hufnagle Park Food Court.

Throughout the festival, many local art exhibitions will be on display. "The Lewisburg Arts Council Annual Indoor Art Exhibit," featuring original works from area artists, can be seen at the Packwood House Museum. The Lewisburg Studio will present its "Annual Photography Exhibit" at its location on Market Street.

The Open Door Art Gallery will be displaying its "Antique Images of Lewisburg and Bucknell University Exhibit." At the Dogwood Hill gift shop, visitors can see a display by Justine Johnston, "The Art of Pressed Flowers."

Other exhibits include the "Union County Historical Society Exhibit" of area log houses at the Union County Courthouse, the "Maine-iacs Exhibit" of artwork at Elizabeth's restaurant and the "Susanne Wind Exhibit" at Sun Bank, showcasing a variety of

When students are teachers

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

It is customary for professionals in the modern working world to have adequate training in their field before beginning at a paid job. Future doctors suffer as residents, lawyers slave away as interns and, similarly, teachers experience student teaching.

But while lawyers and doctors may cry of the hassle and pains they suffer as pre-professionals, most student teachers find the experience less than horrible. Testament from University students proves that student teaching is both an excellent preparation for the duties of teaching as well as a gratifying experience laden with satisfaction.

Dan Blair '03 will graduate with a degree in English. He said his stint as a student teacher, performed from Oct. 1 until winter break of last semester, was as wonderful as it was unexpected.

"It just sort of happened. It wasn't like I dreamed my whole life of becoming a teacher," Blair said.

Blair performed his duties as a student teacher at Mifflinburg High School, teaching ninth-, 10th- and 11th-graders. His duties were that of a full-fledged teacher, not limited to simply grading tests and teaching a few lessons. As required by the University, Blair wrote lesson plans, wrote, administered and graded tests, and even handled disciplinary matters. In his ninth-grade class he dealt with lower level students in a program called "integrated communications."

"It was tough but fun … they were very social. It gave me the best taste of what teaching could be because it was so challenging," Blair said.

At the 10th- and 11th-grade level he experienced the exact opposite, being placed in charge of "gifted" students. He met with equal satisfaction, as he was able to discuss issues of worldly importance, and integrate much of his own studies into his teaching.

The mathematics of meal plans

By Kyle Lange
Staff Writer

Are you finding yourself with 65 meal credits to get rid of with two weeks left in the semester? Are you dying to get off the first-year student meal plan? Which meal plan will you choose for next year?

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

For those of you who deleted the e-mail, there are six meal plans being offered. There are two block plans, where you buy a block of 150 or 220 meal credits for the semester with $75 declining balance added on. There are also two plans where you are given a certain number of meals per week (either 10 meals with $100 declining balance or 19 meals with $75 declining balance) for the entire the semester. For the hungry folks, there is the constant pass plan, where you have unlimited access to Bostwick Cafeteria and the Terrace Room with $75 declining balance and 25 meal credits. Finally there is the flexible spending plan, where you put $550 or more on your declining balance account.

The most important factor to consider in choosing a meal plan is how often you eat at campus dining facilities. Perhaps you're in the habit of cooking your own food, eating out or only eating lunches on campus. If you are one of these people, your choice is simple. Sign up for the $550 Flexible Spending Meal Plan, the cheapest meal plan available. If you run out of meal credits or declining balance, you can always add money to your declining balance account in $50 increments.

If you do eat most of your meals at the University's dining facilities, ask yourself which venue is your favorite. If your favorite place to eat is Bostwick Cafeteria or the Terrace Room, the buffet cafeterias, consider getting a block plan or a certain number of meals per week plan. But those are the only

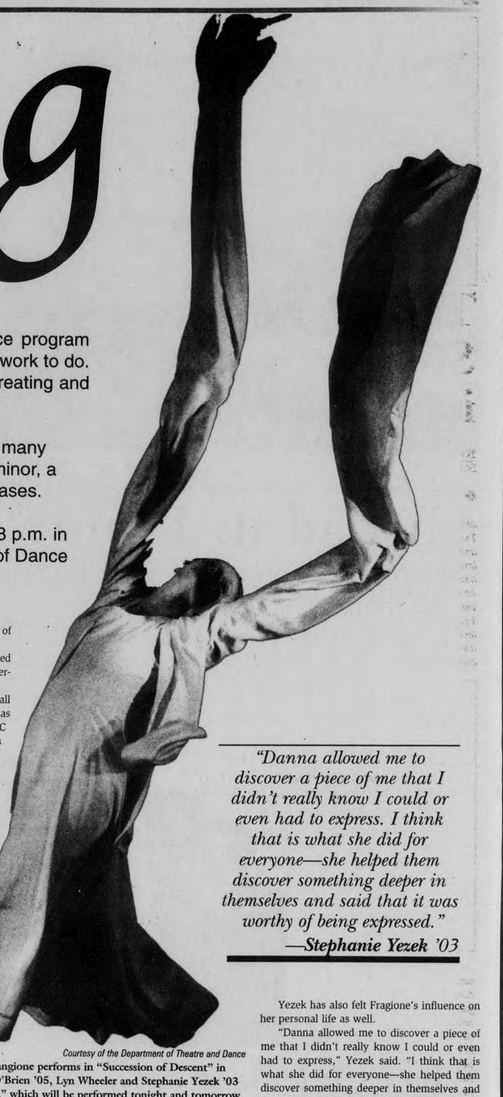
Celebrating 15 YEARS OF dance

By Michelle Dombeck

When Associate Professor of Theatre and Dance Danna Frangione, dance program founder and first director, came to the University in 1987, she had a lot of work to do. As the University's first dance professor, Frangione was responsible for creating and shaping a successful program. She succeeded.

In her time here, she molded the University's dance program into one that provides many opportunities for dancers, including the Bucknell Dance Company (BDC), a dance minor, a dance capstone and foundation seminar, studio concerts and choreographer showcases.

Despite her death in December, her legacy lives on. Tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center, the BDC will present its annual spring concert. Entitled "15 Years of Dance at Bucknell," the concert will honor Frangione and the program she created.



"Danna allowed me to discover a piece of me that I didn't really know I could or even had to express. I think that is what she did for everyone—she helped them discover something deeper in themselves and said that it was worthy of being expressed."

—Stephanie Yezek '03

(Above) Danna Frangione performs in "Succession of Descent" in 1997; (left) Erin O'Brien '05, Lyn Wheeler and Stephanie Yezek '03 dance in "El Calor," which will be performed tonight and tomorrow.

Er-dong Hu, associate professor of theatre and dance, feels that the concert is an opportunity for people to realize the impact Frangione has had.

"This is about letting people know much Danna has done in 15 years," Hu said. "It is about keeping Danna's legacies and allowing the spirit of BDC and the program to move on."

In order to let people know what Frangione has done, there will be a video prologue that chronicals the last 15 years of dance at the University.

On Saturday night, Frangione will also receive an achievement award, which will be accepted by her husband.

Frangoine will not simply be recognized with awards and tributes. She will also be honored in the concert through the performance of three of her pieces. Two of these, "Forces of Nature" and "At First Sight," are being restaged and performed by dancers from the Tsoying High School, which is a dance conservatory in Taiwan where Frangione worked as choreographer in residence for nine years.

"Sacred Harp Suites," another piece Frangione choreographed, is being restaged by Nicole Bradley-Browning '97. This piece is about religion and spirituality.

"I think this dance is about what it is to have real faith versus organized religion and how religion and faith can move you in your soul and that it can be revealed in movement; faith inside your soul can be so overwhelming that it can only show itself through movement. That's what dance is about anyway—emotion that cannot be expressed in words," said BDC Vice President Stephanie Yezek '03, who is performing in the piece. "All the dancers are dressed to look poor and the set is really just a skeleton of two houses, shacks really. But the movement is so rich and powerful that that movement fills the void of the poor exterior of life."

This year, about 20 alumni, many of whom have felt Frangione's impact, are returning to perform in "Nina," a piece choreographed by the first member of BDC, Todd Rosenlieb '89.

Not just alumni and dancers are involved with the concert. Katie Palumbo '03 is performing live for "About Beauty."

"Katie is playing the piano on stage, and all of the dancers interact with the piano as well as with the music and each other," BDC Secretary Allison Hoffmann '06 said. "It's more abstract and not as large or technical as a lot of the other pieces. It's more internal and about different facets of beauty."

Other pieces represent many different genres of dance, including tap, jazz, modern and ballet.

"One of the best things about this program is that it is so eclectic," Yezek said. "Even with pieces that are in the same genre, there's so much difference."

Finishing up the concert is "Huan Qing (Celebration)" by Hu.

"This piece is a resetting of a piece Er-dong did a few years ago. The performers have ribbons, sashes and fans," Hoffmann said. "It's called 'Celebration' because these kinds of props are used to celebrate things in Chinese culture. It's a good way to end the concert."

This concert is celebrating Frangione's life and legacy. Part of the reason people are celebrating is because of the impact Frangione had on invididuals.

"She totally changed my whole perception of dance. She helped me grow into myself as a dancer and a person," Yezek said. "She also taught me that dance can be about you, about the dancer, and that it does not have to be aesthetically pleasing all the time. She taught me that you can create 'ugly' movement for impact. That was one of the greatest things I have ever heard, that dance does not have to be 'pretty' to be considered dance."

Yezek has also felt Fragione's influence on her personal life as well.

"Danna allowed me to discover a piece of me that I didn't really know I could or even had to express," Yezek said. "I think that is what she did for everyone—she helped them discover something deeper in themselves and said that it was worthy of being expressed."

Frangione expressed herself on stage, but off the stage she was a bit reserved.

"Danna was kind of a shy person in private, even though she was such an amazing and outgoing performer on stage," Hoffmann said.

This concert is supported by the Bucknell Association for the Arts. Tickets are available for $6 in the Weis Center Box Office.

"Celebration," "Hit the Beat" and "Waves Against the Sand" are all being performed tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center as part of this year's spring dance concert, which will honor the legacy of Danna Frangione and the history of dance at the University.

Taking Back Sunday releases its debut album

By Dave Allen
Staff Writer

❖ CD Review

"Tell All Your Friends," the debut album from Long Island, N.Y.-based Taking Back Sunday is a loud, concentrated burst of energy that will appeal to fans of such current punk/hardcore bands as Thursday, The Used, The All-American Rejects and Midtown. The video for their first single "Cut from the Team (Cure Without the 'E')" has received airplay on MTV2, and other tracks from the album are played on the campus radio station, 90.5 WVBU.

The album's sonic atmosphere is composed of the usual guitars, bass and drums, characterized by loud, distorted guitars and driving rhythms, but takes an unique approach to singing duties: the band uses two lead singers to sing lyrics in both harmonized unison and in shouted counterpoint. The catchy hooks and shout-along choruses are delivered at two general tempos, either a slow grind or a rapid gallop.

The band's Web site (takingbacksunday.com) describes the lyrics as coming from a "super emo notebook," referring to the often depressed and self-loathing lyrical content of most songs from the punk genre known as "emo." Some typical lyrics from "Tell All Your Friends":

"Best friends means I pulled the trigger/Best friends means you get what you deserve."

"And you can tell all your friends/You've got your gun to my head/This all was only wishful thinking."

"Why can't I feel anything from anyone?"

"The truth is you could slit my throat/and with my one last gasping breath, I'd apologize for bleeding on your shirt."

The band even alludes to the content of their lyrics in the album's last track, "Head Club": "I can't say I blame you, but I wish I could/I'm sick of writing every song about you." Lyrically, "Tell All Your Friends" is not a "feel-good" album; each song is "Creep" by Radiohead toughened up after a few rounds in the mosh pit.

Different textures periodically break up the clamorous guitars and galloping drums, like touches of piano, synthesized strings and haunting female vocals in such songs as "Cut From the Team (Cute Without the 'E')," "Great Romances of the 20th Century," "Ghost Man on Third" and "The Blue Channel."

Overall, the album doesn't tread a whole lot of new ground in the already somewhat-narrow category of modern punk rock, but the use of two lead singers and level of emotion and energy captured in the recording help separate "Tell All Your Friends" from other recent recordings in the genre. Taking Back Sunday is just the kind of up-and-coming band that might be attracted to performing here at Uptown, and they will also be featured on this summer's Vans Warped Tour.

Neo and Smith duel in "The Matrix Reloaded." Opening May 15 in theaters across the country, "The Matrix" sequel is one of several summer movies promising to draw big crowds. Other summer movies include "Finding Nemo," "Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle" and "2 Fast 2 Furious."

Summer flicks face off in movie theaters starting in early May

By Josh Herwitt
Staff Writer

As the sun's rays slowly shed away the clouds of winter and early spring, movie theaters across America will quickly fill with anxious crowds eager to see the new blockbuster thrills this summer. Major studios have been staking out weekend slots for months in hopes of luring large audiences sick of the dog days of summer to the movie theater for their sequel and action-packed smash-hit hopefuls.

Most blockbusters open during Memorial Day weekend, but the intense box office competition over the years has compelled studios to release their projects for early May.

The summer kicks off with the sequel of the X-Men comic book series and the return to whole mutant gang in "X2: X-Men United." An unknown enemy strikes an ominous attack, forcing public outcry and calling the X-Men swad into command. The highly-anticipated action-thriller, "The Matrix Reloaded," will have theaters packed starting May 15. Disney will open its summer hit, "Finding Nemo," on May 30.

June is packed with more wannabe summer blockbuster hits with a new comic book series, "The Hulk," for June 20 and the Charlie's Angels sequel, "Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle," for the following week. The speed-thrilling sequel of the original "Fast and the Furious," "2 Fast 2 Furious," will fill seats come June 6.

Fourth of July weekend unleashes some of heaviest blockbusting hitters. Warner Brothers adds to the pile of summer sequels with its own, presenting "Terminator 3: Rise of the Machines" starring Arnold Schwarzenegger. MGM will compete with its own sequel, "Legally Blonde 2: Red, White and Blonde," as well as Dreamworks' animated "Sinbad: Legend of the Seven Seas."

The rest of July continues the trend of sequels with "Bad Boys II," once again starring Will Smith and Martin Lawrence. Other July releases include "Pirates of the Caribbean," featuring Johnny Depp's July 9 quest to prevent a ship of hostile pirates, and "Seabiscuit," starring Tobey Maguire July 25.

August releases will comprise of the third and final movie of the "American Pie" series—"American Wedding" on August 1—with a large focus of the comedy devoted to the marriage between Jason Biggs (Jim) and Alyson Hannigan (Michelle). Nicolas Cage will return to the big screens August 8 for his new crime-thriller, "Matchstick Men."

The movie theaters should be very successful with the many awaited sequels and some other surprising, yet promising flicks.

"Seamstress" is recommended summer reading

By Melinda Kummer
Arts and Entertainment Editor

❖ Book Review

Aesthetically attracted to the cover first and secondly attracted to the seeming manageable length, I bought the book with little red slippers on the front. Homework and extracurriculars have pushed pleasure reading into gym time. Giving up the elipticle in favor of the more reader-friendly bike, I wanted some light and enjoyable reading.

Considering myself an intellectual that I would even think to buy a book for pleasure reading, I was unprepared for the impact of the cute-looking book.

In a society where "The Simpsons" has replaced Sunday evenings of radio listening, it's hard to imagine a world in which books and literacy maintain the status of precious treasures. To crave the written word as a source of power is a hunger many don't feel, let alone have the desire to risk their lives to obtain that power. And yet, author Dai Sijie recreates such a world in his recently-translated novel, "Balzac and the Little Chinese Seamstress."

Not expecting a strong thematic element concerning communism and the "re-education" practiced under Chairman Mao, I nonetheless became intrigued by two teen-age boys as they searched for literary satisfaction.

An introduction to the main characters, the book begins with a scene soon after the relocation of the city boys into the mountainous regions of China. Luo, the son of a well-known dentist, and the narrator, who remains nameless, try to manipulate the village headman into allowing them to keep their violin. As the main character plays a piece by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Luo announces its fictitious name as "Mozart is Thinking of Chairman Mao." From the start, the boys survive with fast thinking as they play an intricate game with the communists.

Sijie brings a fresh outlook on an infatuation with books in his novel, "Balzac and the Little Chinese Seamstress." A slim yet profound story, "Seamstress" makes a perfect companion to summer relaxation this summer on your beach towel.

Experiencing "re-education" himself in the early '70s, Sijie brings elements of honesty, endearing the pair of boys to the reader. First person narrative personalizes their fear and pain.

Humorous in an understated way, Sijie artistically fuses serious subject matter and wit.

The infatuation the boys shared with the seamstress's daughter softened the intense nature of the book and completed the full circle of challenges they faced. Delicately told, the love story develops and mirrors the boys' love for books.

Widely acclaimed for its stylistic simplicity and elegance, "Balzac and the Little Chinese Seamstress" charted on The New York Times Best Sellers List from December 2002 through February of this year.

The Boston Herald said that Sijie created "A true book lover's book....A testament to resilience and to the power of words," according to the book's jacket cover.

The perfect length for a beach vacation, "Balzac and the Little Chinese Seamstress" is worth a read for those interested in political or literary device.

Cap and Dagger hosts a diversity of performances

From music to prose and poetry, Open Stage Night is a success

By Kristen Habacht
Staff Writer

Tustin Theatre's black box was home to a plethora of talent April 17, as students came to perform for Open Stage Night. This was the second annual open stage night sponsored by Cap and Dagger, the theater and dance club on campus.

"Open stage night was a fun evening where people could just be themselves, and express what they wanted to through music, poetry or prose," said Lee Cromwell '05, who performed a song with Ashi Day '04.

After last year's turnout and positive feedback, Cap and Dagger decided to make the event annual as the students seemed to enjoy the rare opportunity to perform on stage without having to approve pieces through the theatre department.

"I think open stage night was a great opportunity for people to come out and do what they love. It was a fun night with a huge diversity of performances—I hope to see more in the future," Liisa Britt '04 said.

Britt performed poetry as well as a Christopher Durang scene.

While some performed slam poetry, others sang and performed skits. The night was all about celebrating the arts and the often-untapped talent that the campus holds. Though the technical aspects of the night were basic, minimal lighting and no set except chairs, the performers seemed in their element. They performed as though the stage was made for them. A very laid-back atmosphere, both the performers and audience enjoyed the show.

"Open Stage Night provides a wonderful opportunity for people who don't have the time to be involved in the larger-scale productions to come out for just one night and take the stage to dance, sing, read poetry, show off and, most importantly, have some fun!" Treasurer of Cap and Dagger Rachael Slotsgave '04 said.

Cap and Dagger is trying to get more people involved on campus that are not necessarily able to commit large amounts of time to theater—Open Stage Night is just one example of the types of opportunities to come.

Since the technical aspects are kept to a minimun and the rehearsal time requires little committment, Cap and Dagger productions and open stage events will be more accessible allowing more people to enjoy the arts on campus. Even though it was not an epic production, open stage night was relaxing, entertaining and allowed for diversity on the stage.

Professor Hannigan has made 25 years of music on campus

Joining the University music team in 1978 and having performed in Moscow, New Zealand and Honolulu, Professor of Music Barry Hannigan celebrates a quarter century on campus.

By Julianna Pietek
Senior Writer

This year was a milestone for Professor of Music Barry Hannigan. In 1978, he joined the University's music department, making this his 25th year of teaching in the studio, classroom and performing at the University.

"[The University] had a job and I applied," Hannigan said. "I was basically applying for any job that came up—then and they wanted me and I wanted to be here. I think it's a great place in any measure you want to use, the faculty is great, the living environment, the students."

Over the years here, Hannigan has taught piano—an activity he lists as his "main thing"—taught music theory, done committee and departmental work and given lectures, master classes and performances.

"We're required to be active professionally here," Hannigan said. "For me, that's continuing to play."

He has continued to play, performing in Moscow, New Zealand, Ireland, Honolulu, Carnegie Hall and hundreds of other venues. This professional involvement and dedication has translated to the other areas of his work.

"I can't imagine teaching if I wasn't playing myself. Every day I find myself talking about what I've been doing and the connection between what I'm playing and what my students are playing," Hannigan said.

His connection with actual performance and playing is what inspires and motivates Hannigan to continue.

"I feel like I'm still growing as a player, which is very important to me. I'd like to think I'm always getting better as a performer and a player," Hannigan said.

With this improvement comes one of the great challenges of performance.

> "It is the best possible career I could have thought of, just top satisfication in being able to do music every day. I don't know anyone else in their job who is as happy and fulfilled as I have been."
> —Barry Hannigan, professor of music

"We as musicians are continually producing a paradox in that the more we work and the more we practice, the easier it looks," Hannigan said. "This is forever a problem. The more you work, the simpler it seems and sometimes even fellow faculty members don't understand this. There's a lot more to it than you expect."

Together with this seeming contradiction, there are other problems that Hannigan feels musicians face, in general, and at the University.

"I am grateful that the music department has finally gotten some support. We finally have a new building, and we went for so long without those thing. It really is an under-recognized component of Bucknell," Hannigan said. "In any one year, they figured out, one-third of the students are involved in musical activities, either taking a class or performing in an ensemble. That's a huge number that is involved. Somehow, I don't think that's penetrated the consciousness of the school."

Hannigan brought his awareness of this problem to the project he devised after winning the Class of '56 Lectureship Award, the highest presented to a faculty member by the University, with which the University honored in 1990.

According to Hannigan's statement on his Web site, "My project was a record of the process of learning Brahms's Piano Pieces, Op. 119. I recorded the piece once a week, every week, from the first rough sight-reading to the final stages of memory and interpretation, culminating with a performance at the lecture. The lecture consisted of a discussion of the ways in which a piece is learned—from memory problems to interpretive choices. Taped examples of each stage were played to demonstrate how the piece changed during the process."

When asked for the motivation behind such an undertaking, Hannigan said, "The idea was simply that very few people understand musicians, almost none understand how much work and effort it is."

Hannigan feels that the study of piano and music in general can be challenging and continuous work. For Hannigan, it is continuous happiness as well.

"It is the best possible career I could have thought of, just top satisfaction in being able to do music every day. I don't know anyone else in their job who is as happy and fulfilled as I have been. The insane thing is that so many people simply pursue careers for money. The real idea is what is going to make me happy on a daily basis—what do I love?"

It seems apparent that Hannigan has found what he loves in his time here.

"I'm not a big city person. I like to fish, to ride my bike, and to hike," Hannigan said. "New York makes me absolutely crazy—give me Penn's Creek over 5th Avenue any day. If I had really wanted to be a city person, I would have gotten out of here over the years."

Mack scales musical heights

Graduating with a degree in music performance, Ashlee Mack '03 hopes to pursue opportunities at graduate school

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

Ashlee Mack '03 has been playing the piano for almost half of her life. It's no wonder, then, that she has excelled within the music department at the University and become involved in several musical ensembles both on and off campus.

Mack started taking piano lessons when she was 10 years old.

"I just decided to take lessons on my own, and I've kept with it," Mack said. "I also had a lot of influence from my mom."

Now Mack is about to graduate with a degree in music performance. She has enjoyed her experiences in the music department and has no regrets about choosing to study music.

"I'm proud that I decided to stick with what I love the most," Mack said.

Mack has acted as the accompanist for the weekly Catholic mass on campus since her sophomore year. She is actively involved in the Catholic Campus Ministry (CCM) and served as a teaching assistant for music theory courses. She is also a philosophy minor.

Last summer, Mack remained on campus and did research along with her adviser and piano instructor, Associate Professor of Music Lois Svard. Mack researched how different learning styles affect musicians' abilities, both during practice and in performance. She said the study was very interesting and rewarding.

Having worked with Mack for four years, Svard said she has an appreciation for her talent and work ethic.

"Mack is an unusually gifted musician and it has been a distinct pleasure for me to work with her for the past four years," Svard said.

"Even as a first-year student she was accompanying senior recitals with a professionalism that is usually found only in more experienced pianists."

Last year, Mack joined The Society for Chromatic Art, a music ensemble based in New York City. The group presents two to three concerts each year in New York featuring modern music.

"We play music from the 20th century, as well as music by composers who are still living today," Mack said.

Mack is hoping to attend graduate school next year for music performance.

"I'd ultimately like to be in the field of either music accompaniment or chamber music," Mack said. "I think you get the most out of working with other musicians."

The dedication Mack brought to the university will serve her well as she moves on to the musical field.

mixed media landscapes.

Mahon attributes the past success of the festival to the quality of the artists and the dedication of the Arts Council members.

"We have a wonderful group of volunteers," Mahon said. "This is our 34th year of the festival. We have a committee structure and we try to come up with a lot of new ideas each year."

Mahon said that the Arts Council incorporated University groups in the festival's roster, as well as the concentrated on individual performers as part of the theme on children, to include the entire community.

"This year, we intentionally have small solos or duos performing throughout the day," Mahon said. "We're also trying to coordinate the event as a whole more this year."

As part of this coordination effort, the Campus Theatre will present a movie singalong event on Sunday. The Sing-A-Long Sound of Music is "a live multimedia event that brings the Rogers and Hammerstein classic straight to the dancing shoes and vocal chords of audiences of all ages," according to the schedule of events. "After an invigorating warm-up led by local celebrity Vic Boris, the audience will boo Nazis, brandish 'Edelweiss' and hiss the Baroness as they play along with this timeless classic reformatted with all new subtitled lyrics."

For those who miss out on the fun of the Arts Festival, Lewisburg will also present the Lewisburg Live mini music festival on May 3. Bands participating in this event include Tom n' Nate Blues Duo, Carolyn Gathman, Callanish Celtic Band, Big Band Nostalgia, Riverstone, Conjugal Visit, Andy Burr and Friends, Classical Jazz Quartet and Cory Kyle.

Meal plan mathematics—simplifying the numbers

After analyzing all of the figures and available options, the ideal meal plan for every student is easy to determine

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Students wait at the salad bar, a station that often has the longest line in the Bostwick Cafeteria. Students who enjoy frequent meals during the day and like the all-you-can-eat style of the Cafeteria will be interested by the new Constant Pass, which offers an unlimited number of visits to the Cafeteria.

places where it is worth it to use meal credits.

Consider what you are paying for each meal credit. Assuming that there are 16 weeks in a semester, you pay $4.58 per meal credit with the 19 meals per week plan (commonly known as the first-year student meal plan), $6.56 per meal credit with the 10 meals per week plan, $6 per meal credit with the 220 block plan and $6.90 per meal credit with the 150 block plan.

Do these numbers seem a little high to you? They are high compared to the current exchange rate at the Bison Food Court and Larison Dining Hall. If you use a meal credit at either of these locations, you are given $2.45 for breakfast, $3.60 for lunch and $4.45 for dinner. No matter which plan you use, you lose money each time you trade in a meal credit.

You can even lose money on meal credits by eating at the buffet venues. If you use the flexible meal plan, the buffet venues charge $4.60 for breakfast, $6.15 for lunch and $7.25 for dinner. If you purchase the 150 block plan or the 10 meals per week plan, the only good deal you get is having dinner at Bostwick Cafeteria. If you have lunch or breakfast at either of the buffet venues, it would be cheaper to use declining balance to buy your meal. Only buy either of these meal plans if you love eating dinner and only dinner in Bostwick Cafeteria.

If you like to eat lunch and dinner at the buffet venues every day, go for the 220 block plan (which adds up to roughly 14 meals per week). If you like to eat three meals a day, with a majority being at the buffet venues, sign up for the 19 meals per week plan. Both of these plans give you a good deal on lunch and dinner at the buffet venues, but you end up buying a lot of meals.

There isn't much rationale for the constant pass meal plan, unless you want to gain 15 pounds every year that you're here. This plan is essentially the same as the 19 meals per week plan, unless you are in the habit of eating six meals a day instead of three. The main drawbacks with this plan are that you can't pay for guests unless you use the bonus meal credits, and that the constant pass is worthless when the buffet venues are closed.

> *Consider what you are paying for each meal credit. If you eat at the Bison or Larison for at least half of your lunches and dinners, go for the flexible spending meal plan. It is the most economically sensible and flexible meal plan that is offered. Unlike the 19 meals per week and 10 meals per week plans, there is no penalty for not eating a given quota of meals on campus during a given week. You can use your ID card at any campus dining location at any time, without having to worry about whether or not meal credit is accepted. You have to pay a little more to eat at the buffet venues, but as long as you go for breakfast or lunch, it's not a terrible deal.

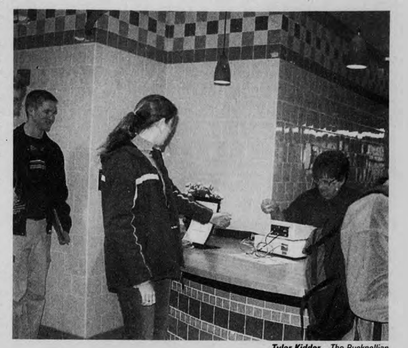
Just a few more tips to pass along to you: If you choose the flexible spending meal plan, and you have a friend who chooses a block plan, help each other out. If you eat at the buffet cafeterias, have your friend pay. When you eat at the Bison, pay for your friend.

Also, underestimate how much food you will eat in a given semester. You can always add dollars to your meal plan, but there is no rebate at the end of the year for leftover meal credits and declining balance. Choose a meal plan that makes sense to you.



Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Students hand off their IDs at the entrance of the Bostwick Cafeteria. Students on the 19 meals/week plan tend to eat in the Cafeteria to avoid constantly adding declining balance to their cards.

—10 meals per week with $100 Declining Balance: $1,150.00

—220 Block with $75 Declining Balance: $1,394.00

—150 Block with $75 Declining Balance: $1,109.50

—Constant Pass with $75 Dining Dollars & 25 Bonus Meals: $1,575.00

—Flexible Spending Meal Plan—min. $550 w/$50 increment increases

Always popular during the peak hours for the Bison, Subversions draws its normal line of students. Students who eat frequently in the Bison are much better off sticking to an all-declining meal plan for next year.

Abroad perspective: semester in London, England

happy and satisfied by doing it. It allowed me to wander the streets and get lost finding out more of London and its culture. It was interesting trying to ask local residents for directions because of the different phrase and words that they used. I was able to find what I needed and we created an amazing, delicious and filling homemade "London" Thanksgiving meal. While this was late in the semester, I realized then that I could be ready for all challenges in the future because I could work my way through them and make the best out of any situation.

A second favorite experience in London took place on Oct. 14, which will not be a night I will soon forget. The Duke University basketball team was in London in competition with several of the London League teams. On their last night in the city, Shawn, Andrew, John and I went to the game. When it was over, we started to shout to them to come to a place called the Sports Café, which ended up being a Tuesday night ritual for lots the American students in London. None of us had thought that they heard us, but we were in the mood to go out so we went there anyway. Shortly thereafter I happened to glance towards the entrance where I saw a 6-foot-11-inch Casey Saunders entering. That night, we hung out with Saunders, Chris Duhon, J.J. Reddick, Andre Buckner, Sean Dockery and Nick Horvath. They were incredibly down to earth and just like any other college student, which was somewhat of a surprise considering that on court they are such different individuals.

Saunders offered me some advice that night for the rest of my stay in London. He said, "Don't be afraid to do whatever you want to—experiences are more valuable than any dollar amount and will lead to a well-rounded future." From that night on, if I wanted to do something I did it, regardless what others did or did not want to do.

I also had the thrill and enjoyment of traveling into mainland Europe to experience different cultures in their homelands. My travels included eight days in Italy, three days in Brussels, three days in Salzburg, three days in Munich and finally three days in Prague.

The City Museum of Prague is one of the many places in Europe that Ramakrishna travelled to during his semester in London, England.

Though I considered myself well-traveled before going aboard, I have never recognized the sheer differences between the various cities I stayed in. The added experience of staying in youth hostels as opposed to hotels added to the value. By far, my favorite place I visited was Prague.

Although terribly cold towards the end of December, the beauty of the city's architecture, the language and the sidewalks made it so memorable. Yes, the sidewalks were memorable because each street in the city had sidewalks that were decorated and colorful, but no two were the same. It added to the flavor the city had to offer.

While the languages were not a problem in the other countries, as I was able to communicate in those languages limitedly, there was no chance I was going to be able to make out any Czech. The language could be easily connected to another one that I knew. This led to some very interesting interaction with some local vendors, as we were unable to fully communicate with each other while bargaining for souvenirs.

Having the opportunity to study and live abroad definitely has given me a new well-rounded perspective on how to go through life. While I had an amazing time traveling to new cities, and meeting people of many backgrounds, the self-reflection of my experience is what truly mattered. I feel as if I am now better prepared to move into uncomfortable and unfamiliar areas. I know that I will be able to jump into the situation and can adjust so that it becomes familiar. I am more confident with meeting new people, interacting within new cultures and starting a fresh new life. I will never forget the experiences I had in London, and the great people I met there. They were all parts of my life for three months, and will definitely be in the future as well.

Don Krech

Not only the king of purchasing and parking, he's king of blues, playing guitar in an award-winning blues band

Don Krech poses with his guitar. Lipsmackin' Blues Band, for which Krech plays, recently won the Billtown Blues Challenge.

Krech hit a high note recently when the Lipsmackin' Blues Band won the Billtown Blues Challenge. The win means that Krech and the other three members of the band will be competing against approximately 65 other bands at the International Blues Challenge (IBC) in Memphis, Tenn., in January 2004 on the famous Beale Street.

The band came together when Krech met the drummer, Stu Shrawder, at a local music collective in Mifflinburg. The drummer had a friend, Tom Martin, who played the "blues harp," a harmonica, and they also found a bass player in Andy Seal. Their first performance was an impromptu session at the King Street Coffee House in Northumberland in January 2002, where they performed for the first time—they hadn't even rehearsed together yet. Krech said that the performance went surprisingly well for a group that didn't know each other.

"We were a perfect match even though we hadn't all met before. We could feel each other out well as we went through the songs," Krech said.

This was not Krech's first experience in the music business. He had been in several bands prior, and ended his 20-year hiatus from the music scene when he formed the Lipsmackin' Blues Band.

The Billtown Blues Challenge involved the band making a compact disc of its songs, from which five bands were selected as semifinalists. The semifinalists performed 30-minute slots at the competition. The slots were timed, and bands were penalized for how much under or over the time limit they went.

Krech said that the bands were judged based on presence, originality, musicality, crowd interaction and how "bluesy" the band was.

According to Krech, the band has a great sense of musicality.

"We work more with dynamics, and we bring a jazz feel to the blues using the guitar, harp, bass and drums. Unlike most bands, you can't spot a leader—everything we do, solos or improvs, fits within the music," Krech said.

Winning the Billtown Blues Challenge will not only send Lipsmackin' Blues Band to Memphis, but it also gives the band the opportunity to open for the Billtown Blues Festival on June 8 in Williamsport. Blues greats such as Roy Rogers and Maria Muldaur will be performing at the festival.

Krech said that friends and family are renting buses to travel to Memphis and cheer on Lipsmackin' Blues Band.

"It's great to have community support and see familiar faces in the audience," Krech said.

If the band wins at the IBC, they could win time at Arden's, a recording studio in Memphis, cash prizes and the opportunity to perform at some of the top blues clubs around the country.

"Since we all have good jobs, we have no idea what we'll do if we win," Krech said.

Krech has been at the University for six years. He said he would enjoy bringing his passion for the blues to campus.

"I'd love to teach a course on the blues here," Krech said.

During the summer, Krech participates in the summer softball league.

"It's one of the strengths of the University that it's not just a staff or faculty league, it's students, staff and faculty all together," Krech said. "It's a great way to relax over the summer. The league seems to grow more and more each year."

Krech was dubbed the "Parking Czar" by a former vice president of the University when he was chosen to chair the parking committee. In this role, Krech deals with stabilizing lots for parking, not parking violations. One of his goals is to have signs on each lot that state what type of parking the entire lot is—student, faculty or visitor.

Being the director of Procurement Services keeps Krech busy working on buying goods and services for the University, such as tables, chairs, long-term services and laundry equipment, and also managing contracts.

"Procurement Services provides the best value for the University for goods and services," Krech said.

Judy Mickanis, RICS director, works with Krech on a regular basis.

"Don is a person of high integrity, with quick wit and a love of music. I enjoy working with him because he can find humor in any situation," Mickanis said.

The University is not all business for Krech—his wife, Marjean, also works at the University, and his son, Adrian is a junior on campus. Krech's other son, Niles, is currently in the Marines.

Dominic Romany '04

After attending a conference, Romany wants to bring Affirmative Action to the forefront of issues at the University

By Elisabeth Hulette
Senior Writer

In a school where the words "diversity" and "multicultural" evoke responses ranging from controversial to apathetic, Dominic Romany '04 has actively embraced what is perhaps the granddaddy of all such issues—affirmative action.

The issue has received even more press than usual recently, due to the widespread public debate over one student's application to the University of Michigan School of Law. The student sued the school for rejecting her in favor of accepting minority students who had lower grade point averages than she did, citing the school's affirmative action policy as the cause. The suit has generated great controversy, so much in fact that the National Society of Black Engineers (NSBE) devoted its annual conference to the topic.

This was the political atmosphere into which Romany was thrown when he attended the conference in California in March, along with four other members of Bucknell's chapter of NSBE. The organization's main objective is to increase the number of blacks who succeed academically and positively impact society, and the conference is an annual effort to unite chapters of NSBE from universities across the country.

Lectures and discussions were presented on affirmative action, with a focus on educating attendees on the specifics of the issue.

"There is so much to learn about affirmative action," Romany said. "There's a side no one seems to represent. People aren't educated enough about the positions they take."

The conference also inspired Romany to attend a march in Washington, D.C., in support of affirmative action. Along with thousands of other protesters, Romany participated in demonstrations in front of the Supreme Court and marched to the Washington Monument to hear a series of speakers, one of whom had presented a talk at the NSBE conference.

"I wanted to show support for affirmative action, and use what I learned at the conference," Romany said of his participation in the march. "Talk is cheap, and if you don't do anything about your beliefs, nothing will get done."

Romany is originally from Trinidad, where he lived until his family moved to Lewisburg about seven years ago. Romany, an electrical engineering major, has spent the past three years trying to bridge the race gap by expanding his circle of friends to include peers across the diversity spectrum.

Now he has a new focus—to help his fellow students understand the history and truth behind affirmative action. Romany said one of the main reasons why people are against affirmative action is that they have not been fully educated on the subject.

"At this school, people only hear the negative, not the positive aspects of affirmative action—and they don't have the opportunity to learn," Romany said.

Friend Travis Martin '04 said watching Romany's attempts at generating a buzz about affirmative action is inspirational.

"Even if people don't agree with him, he is spreading knowledge, and that is the key to any type of change," Martin said.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Dominic Romany '04 attended a conference on affirmative action in California. He plans on using his knowledge to further change on campus.

Romany cited several myths about affirmative action that, although commonly held, can be disproved with the right information. For example, some believe that affirmative action is out of date and unnecessary today due to other strides taken toward social equality. But statistics still show women's income at 76 cents to the man's dollar, and for the black community, an unemployment rate at twice that of Caucasians.

According to Romany, educational systems in cities are far inferior to those of suburbs, and because inner city kids cannot afford the same help with their SATs and schoolwork that the suburban kids can, their applications to college fall short by comparison. Such students need assistance to get the same opportunities to succeed as their white counterparts, something affirmative action seeks to provide.

Romany said the ultimate goal of affirmative action is to change the balance of power beyond the educational system, "to make the high levels of society reflect society itself, to change the dynamic of who is in power."

Romany plans to bring speakers to campus next year to talk about some of the issues surrounding affirmative action. He has constructed a Web site that presents some of the information he gathered at the NSBE conference (http://www.students.bucknell.edu/jromany/).

"Racism is still an issue in this country, and we have to deal with it in a way that will benefit society overall. Affirmative action is not perfect, but it is the only system available right now that is objective," Romany said.

Students gain tools of the trade and discover the rewards of teaching through their experiences as student teachers

"As a teacher in a high school, if you can combine information from different areas and tailor to the student's interests, you can make them like or at least appreciate everything," Blair said. "It was hard work—7 a.m. to midnight most days—but it was terrific."

Blair is still uncertain where his path will lead after graduation. He plans to volunteer in Ecuador starting next fall, teaching English as a second language. After that more schooling is likely, possibly in London where Blair spent all of last year. Eventually, highly inspired by his student teaching experience, Blair will land in education and make use of his talent as a teacher.

Another satisfied veteran of student teaching is Aaron Bates '03. His time was spent at Milton Senior High School in the fall of 2002, where he taught American history to 9th-grade students, as well as psychology and advanced placement psychology classes to a mix of juniors and seniors. Similar to Blair, Bates was required to undertake all teaching obligations, encompassing classroom duties like test preparation and implementation as well as hall monitoring and midterm reports.

"It's not as easy as it looks from the outside. No amount of training received prior to this experience would help me in the field. You need to learn to adjust as the day goes ... you have to be adaptive," Bates said.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Bates attributed his desire to teach to both wonderful and horrible teachers he has encountered as a student. He hopes to be able to emulate those who have taught him best, filling even the biggest of shoes, as well as prevent students from experiencing some of the bad learning experiences he has had. Although he has no job lined up, as most educational facilities have a peak hiring season that does not conveniently correlate with graduation, he plans to move westward to Wisconsin in search of employment. Ultimately, Bates hopes to become a social studies teacher in a middle or high school, but will take on an educational affiliated job until he locates such a specified position.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

"My major goal is not just to have my top students succeed in their fields of study, but to see all students exceed across the board whether they are going to college, into the military or immediately entering the work force," Bates

Kate Kelly '03 said that student teaching was extremely satisfying and offered her a sense of accomplishment. Always having enjoyed working with children, teaching is practically in Kelly's genes—her mother, grandmother and two of her uncles are teachers. Her interests, and four years of experience at a Girl Scout camp near Boston, have piqued her interest in elementary school age children, which is the level at which she plans to work.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Her current position is in a third-grade classroom in Selinsgrove Intermediate School, where she teaches English, spelling, reading, math, social studies and science. She will finish her job on May 2, which will have given her four weeks of all-day teaching, as well as additional time doing partial days.

"Even though I have to get up at 6:30 every morning to go to school, I don't mind because I enjoy teaching. I want to make a difference in the lives of others. I think teaching will be an excellent way to do this," Kelly said.

One facet of her job that has been particular interesting is a requisite program that is designed to benefit one student's education. Kelly is required to do a case study on one student in her class, and then design an action plan to enhance his or her learning experience. In addition to her teaching duties, Kelly is actively trying to complete her certification tests. Because she plans on teaching in Massachusetts, she has to take exams beyond those required for Pennsylvania certification.

"Student teaching has been a lot of work. By Friday, I'm usually exhausted. But I can't think of any way I'd rather spend my last semester at [the University]," Kelly said.

Though each of these individuals had an entirely different experience with their student teaching, it is clear each benefited from the opportunity. Whether at the elementary, middle or high school level, student teaching is a good way to reaffirm goals and achieve satisfaction, as well as have a positive impact on the lives of children. Not only that, but it is a look into the future that is approaching so rapidly, as Blair, Bates and Kelly would quickly confirm.

> "Even though I have to get up at 5:30 every morning to go to school, I don't mind because I enjoy teaching. I want to make a difference in the lives of others. I think teaching will be an excellent way to do this."

Smoking on Campus

By Meghan Ball
Features Editor

We have all seen the black lungs in health class or the video with the guy so addicted to cigarettes that he is smoking through a hole in his throat. We are inundated with anti-smoking propaganda. It seems that officials are slowly outlawing smoking in all public areas. Students that were here just five years ago can remember when there were indoor places to smoke—now there is no building on campus where people can smoke. So with all the bad press tobacco and nicotine receive, why are there still college students smoking?

Isn't that the big question when more and more health risks related to the habit are constantly being discovered?

Smokers seem so aware of the risks that many refer to their cigarettes as cancer sticks, yet they continue to take them outside to smoke.

As graduate student Matt Perakovich said, "Everyone knows the health risks involved. If they bug you all that much then you wouldn't do it."

In fact, all of the smokers interviewed knew the many different ways smoking could kill them. They had all been told the risks countless times before.

"Someone telling me that [it is going to kill me] 400 times a day isn't really going to make a difference" Chris Janczuk '06 said.

Some students said that the risks are not disincentive enough to stop smoking.

"There are so many things that risk your health every day. You only live once," one senior female said.

The students who choose to smoke are not concerned about the health risks, and all interviewed said that they were going to quit eventually. But why are they out there smoking now, despite the rain and the cold?

"There is a social world when it comes to smokers because there are a lot of people on this campus who smoke, but logistically it is impossible," Van Lan '04 said.

The smokers at the University seem to band together as they perch under tiny ledges in the rain and huddle close during the long cold winters.

"Smoking is a very communal thing. Most of my first friends I met here at Bucknell I met when I was smoking," Mike Kelley '06 said.

In addition to the regular smokers on campus, there is a large population of social smokers.

"Once I got to college it was a social atmosphere—a lot of people are social smokers. In fact, a good portion of people on campus will smoke when they have been drinking at a bar or a frat," one male student said.

Socially-induced smoking is common, some students said.

"I'm probably the most popular guy on a Friday or Saturday night—everyone wants to bum a cigarette," one junior said.

Another said that every time she had started smoking again, "it always started as a social thing."

Maybe all the social smokers walking around campus during the week account for the fact that very few smokers said they were ever given a hard time for smoking. Outside of the occasional cough as people pass, smokers for the most part are left alone.

One student's response, when asked why she smoked, was even more basic then the social scene.

"I smoke because I think it's fun," a junior female said.

Others smoke because of nicotine's addictive qualities.

"Because I am a smoker, I'm addicted," Mike Kelley '06 said.

Still other students said smoking is their luxury.

"[Smoking is] a point in the day when I get to take a moment to myself," one female senior said.

The smoking culture on campus seems to be a strong one, even if over half of the people interviewed requested that they not be identified. It seems everyone that smokes regularly has someone who they just don't want to know of their habit. But they all keep doing it, for social reasons, a way to relieve stress or just because. They all know the health risks, which will someday be enough to make them stop.

"I'll stop after college" said one. "After law school" said another. "When I start a family" was the most popular response.

And as one junior girl said, "I like it right now and am not ready to quit yet. Someday I will deal with that, but not yet."

A year at Oxford

The Radcliffe Camera, a famous library in Oxford, is possibly the most recognizable building in Oxford. Hays often escaped to the Lover Reading Room contained within the building.

By Katie Hays
Senior Writer

My year abroad began with fire.

Looking out the window just after takeoff from New York City's JFK airport, scanning the skyline for an opening where the Twin Towers had recently been engulfed in flame and anticipating a year abroad at the University of Oxford, I sat next to a man who folded his hands in his beard. I folded my hands also; it was a night flight, and I aimed to sleep.

When balls of flame shot past my window, and a stewardess ran—sprinted—up the aisle to the cockpit, the bearded man did not stir.

When volleyball-sized sparks accompanied the flames, when a stewardess hid her head in her hands, when the flames streaming past the window accompanied the pilot's crackle that there was a problem and we would try to drain fuel and return to New York, when there were murmurs of fire, terror, terrorists, attack, and we realized we would not land in England after all, the bearded man closed his eyes.

When, after fuel had streamed from the plane, after more announcements and tightened seatbelts and more flames, our England-bound plane landed in New York, my companion and I picked up our suitcases and exited the plane.

My statement connecting the year abroad with fire was not metaphorical. The fire happened—but it also describes, in miniscule, the inevitable study abroad experience: anticipation of an experience entirely different than what follows; immersion and participation in a culture unknown to us; fear and hope and confusion; believing ourselves destined for one place but, ultimately, wondering whether we will settle anywhere at all; returning to the place from which we came, often too soon—and often before we seem to have landed.

Fire is what I first encountered, not only on the plane, but also during the weekend that followed two days of orientation in London. Fire is what I encountered during a family stay in Chandlers Ford, England, organized by Butler's Institute for Study Abroad, the program through which I applied to Oxford.

As my British "brother" James begged for no tom-ah-toes in his macaroni and cheese, I jumped fires and fired upon men—in the same video games American children play. Later, James and I drew a map of his room as an enchanted country—James's floor became a bog, his bed a walled fortress.

Once I had moved into Oxford, my desk became a bog, my bed a fortress. Surrounded by those walls, I withdrew. Studying, sleeping and cooking entire meals in that room—fish fried on the wall heater, pasta boiled in a self-heating kettle, sauce simmering on the boiling water's steam—I became a recluse.

I mention this for the benefit of those who plan to study abroad (or those who learn from the actions of others): Self-imposed seclusion in a foreign country is not as glamorous in actuality as it is when imagined. My year transformed itself only after I began to leave the castle and bog of my room, and see my surroundings.

I had visited a Web site and e-mailed the president of Oxford's Poetry Society, Alex Runchman, while still at Bucknell. Alex and I had begun to correspond on our favorite poets and the club (termed "society" in England), so when I arrived at one of Oxford University's component colleges—Worcester College—and decided to emerge from my walled fortress, Alex met me at the College pub. He became my first friend.

Alex and I were both English literature students at Worcester College. Under the governing body of Oxford University, each of Oxford's individual colleges selects its students, provides accommodations and plans its students' tutorials.

The tutorial system at Oxford brought Alex and me to one of the same teachers: Virginia Woolf scholar David Bradshaw, T-shirt wearing editor of Oxford World Classics editions of Woolf's novels and shorter fiction. In our one-on-one tutorials, David Bradshaw, at times clad in "trainers," commanded me to read my weekly 10-page Woolf papers aloud. Bradshaw proceeded to pace about the room as I read them, frequently interrupting to approve or interrogate.

During the days, I began biking to the Radcliffe Camera, Bodleian library or to the more distant English faculty library to find the many books on the week's reading list. Opening at 10 a.m. and closing at 2 p.m. on Sundays, and often forbidding students to remove any book from its confines, Oxford's libraries became a challenge of its academics.

Oxford's academics challenged me in more useful ways. Because students enroll in two tutorials each term, and the University functions on a trimester system, I had six tutorials during my year there. Self-selected and eclectic, the tutorials varied drastically according to the tutor who led them.

In a Wordsworth tutorial, my tutor assigned all of Wordsworth's work and as much criticism as primary material. In a Chaucer tutorial, I read the "Canterbury Tales" in Middle English. Other tutorials were less centered on single authors: One "tute" brought Kyd, Jonson and Marlowe; another allowed authors from Stoker to Dickens, and from Austen to George Eliot; a third focused upon the works of Philip Larkin and Ted Hughes.

David, my Woolf tutor, dismissed most critical works as unessential—but through his scorn I was able to read all of Woolf's novels, twice. We read her journals, letters, her shorter fiction and her biographers.

In addition to tutorials, I soon learned that students can attend any classes they like—classes are not for credit, but for enrichment. Seated at the back of Hermione Lee's lectures on Virginia Woolf, and reading her biography of Woolf, I felt Hermione had become as revered, for me, as Woolf herself.

David and Hermione's presences at Oxford were the reason I had applied, and the Woolf studies were the most stirring part of my academic experience there.

During the winter, rain, early darkness and the gray provided me with the excuse not to stir. When I had again burrowed into the bog of my room with tea and books, a friend in America came online and told me to go into the city and "make a new friend." Scowling but obedient, I walked five minutes to Broad Street's Sheldonian Theatre, where Oxford's choir was performing Handel's "Messiah."

Seated in the highest and cheapest seating level, "the gods," the elderly woman next to me complained, "It's awful when these are the only seats! The gods are so uncomfortable!" When I suggested she sit with her feet tucked beneath her legs, she laughed, said she was too old and later added, "I'm Kathie." We exchanged phone numbers.

Kathie Neary began to coax me out of my room's walls as often as did Alex.

A widow whose husband had been counselor to the Queen and the City of London, Kathie invited me to tea at the historical Hartwell House, where British Prime Minister Tony Blair and former U.S. President Bill Clinton had been on a retreat the day before our visit. We dined at La Maison Blanc; we drove to see the Mystery Plays performed in a village of thatched cottages at Long Crendon; we wandered through Magdalen College's fritillaries in spring; we grinned as Kathie called to describe how her neighbor, Rowan Atkinson (Mr. Bean), had nearly hit her car as he backed out of his driveway.

"I should have let him hit me!" she said.

At her home on the outskirts of Oxford, Kathie showed me videos of her late husband and her at banquets with the Queen. She told stories of earthquakes, fires and great rifts in the ground during her childhood in India. Kathie brought me to tour the offices of the Oxford English Dictionary, for which her daughter Jo is an editor.

In turn, I invited Kathie to attend Evensong (a service of the Church of England) at the College Chapel, where I would be giving the night's reading. I invited her to a walk in Worcester's gardens and sporting grounds, and to Worcester College Formal Hall, the later meal served to students each evening. There, we wore the required black gowns and stood behind our chairs at long tables set with silver as the hall's enormous door thudded shut, Grace was recited in Latin, and the Provost rapped his gavel to tell us, "Formal Hall has begun."

Each course was served to Kathie, other students and me, as we sat, wine bottles on the table, speaking of dogs.

During that year, formality descended to informality as quickly as calm grew to fire.

In lieu of Formal Hall one night, Alex and I rode a noisy bus to Oxford's Greyhound Races. We bet on a dog named Fabulous Yes. Fabulous Yes answered our confidence in him with a Resounding No, finishing last of all the Greyhounds. Later, Alex rented a pub and held a "Fancy Dress" party, a common practice in Britain, themed "Heroes and Villains in English literature." I dressed as Mrs. Dalloway, Alex as King Arthur.

We packed a picnic and went punting on the Isis. Robert Penn Warren's daughter Rosanna read her poetry for the Poetry Society; we sang at a pub with visiting reader John Haines; Seamus Heaney spoke on the creative process. On the six-year anniversary of her husband's death, Kathie and I met at Le Petite Blanc and she pointed to fricassée of snails on the menu, saying, "That's what Jack would have ordered." I began to spend very little time in my room.

In the Spring, as editor for Oxford's poetry journal, "The Reader," I spent nine hours one night proofing an issue with a graying, monotonous man who insisted he read each line break, period, word, capital letter and comma of each soon-to-be-published poem aloud, slowly, as I checked our proofs against the original.

The man was, notably, American.

Our efforts felt satisfying only when Oxford's "The Reader" was finished and on sale at Blackwell's, the man folded into memory.

During the first of Oxford's two six-week breaks between concentrated eight-week trimesters, I lived in London in a friend's dorm room, and spent a week in Paris. During the second break, near the end of my year abroad, I lived in Greece, in a fishing village, Naoussa, on the small island of Paros. It was during this second break, just weeks before returning to America, that I experienced fire again.

For a few days during that time, Dan Blair, another senior at Bucknell this year, and a photographer, visited. We rented a small green Maribello. Dan named the Maribello Billy.

For a rental car, Billy behaved impressively. Billy brought us to the tops of mountains overlooking the long fields of Paros' yellow and purple wildflowers. Billy heaved himself above ancient winding walls and white, domed churches. Billy stopped at a dimly lit Taverna where an ancient man opened and closed his mouth at us but emitted no sound. Coasting to the tiny town of Aliki, Billy wove through red caked, narrow mountain passages, past flocks of white birds silhouetted against the sea and sky, which blended together as if a storm were approaching.

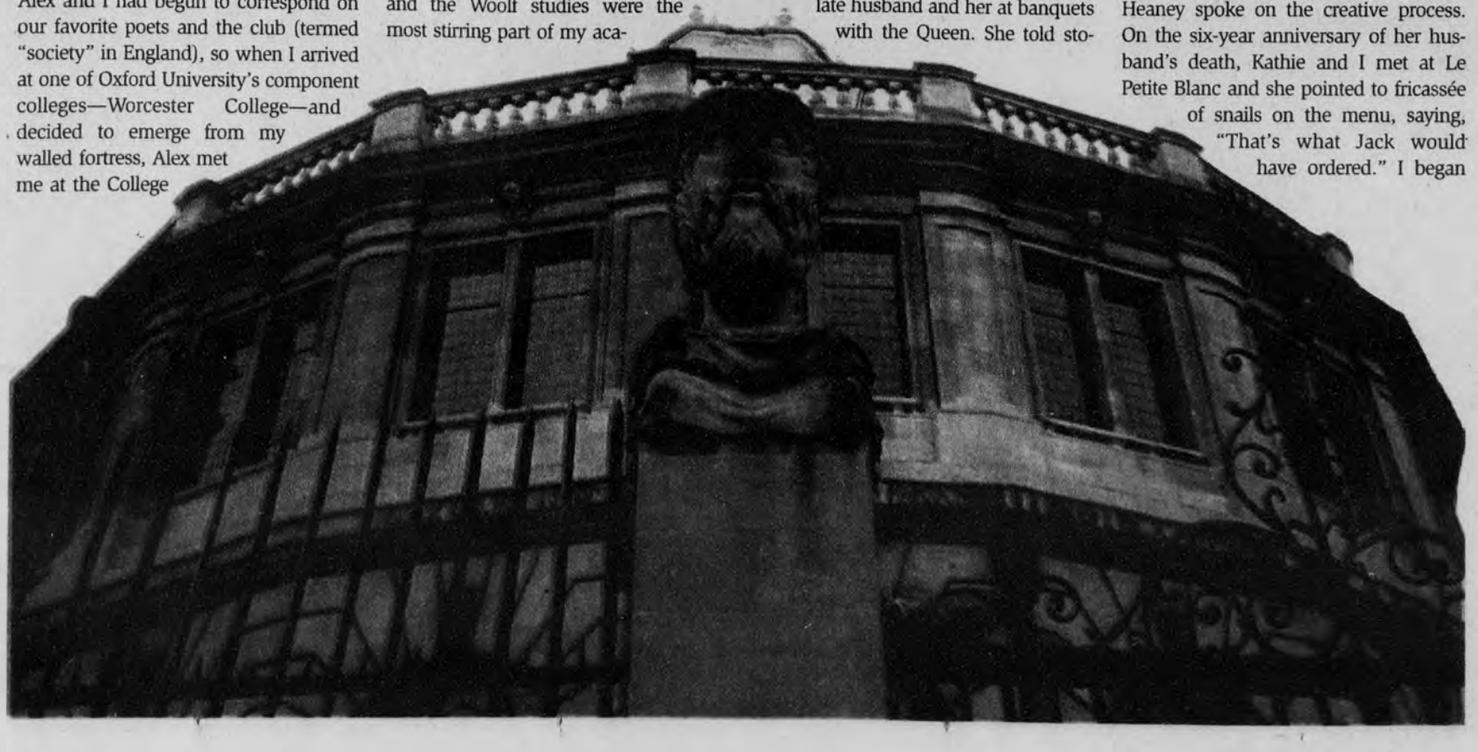
A storm of sorts was approaching—for Billy.

As he began to reveal his decrepitude, Billy-the-rental-car created his parallel to my lesson with fire in flight. Billy shuddered as he climbed past sheep whose bells clanked in the increasing wind. As the first raindrops began to fall, Billy emitted, to our pity and embarrassment, foul-smelling white and black smoke from his hood.

We then learned that Billy had no water in his radiator.

At an unremarkable EKO gas station, Billy exploded. Greek was yelled. The flames crept higher. Billy made no comment. The owner's daughter brought a hose. There were billows of smoke before a distant Greek flag. Billy was cursed. Dan took a photo.

Watching Billy's rented body collapse, I thought of airplanes—how fire interrupts our expectations; how it flares during a routine flight, or on a red-dusted road in a Greek rental car. How, whether en route to England, or on a drive in the Greek countryside, we learn as much about the fire, the new experience, as we do about ourselves. We see how we respond to foreignness—the bearded man with his acceptance, the stewardess with her frenzy and fear, Dan with his camera, the gas station owners with their curses, the teen-aged daughter with her hose.

Whether I had been familiar with life's incendiary nature or not, whether pyromaniac or pyrophobic, whether Oxford or elsewhere, last year I experienced several forms—literal and metaphorical—of burning.


And if fire is what fascinates and scares us, sears us if touched and can singe off our very fingerprints, then it is the reality of every student studying abroad. It is a difficulty. It is a blessing. Fire, like study abroad, is a transfiguring experience.
